"For me it's exciting, I'm sure for the players it's very exciting," Dacko said. "If you look at it, we have a very tough schedule and every game presents a new challenge. Any team can beat up on another team on any given night, so we have had to prepare for anything that can happen against Sacred Heart."

As Dacko noted, the Minutewomen have an extremely difficult schedule this season. They will play 13 teams that ended the 2001-02 campaign with 15 wins or over and six with over 20 wins. It all adds up to UMass holding the 44th toughest schedule in the nation. The first challenge on slate is Friday night against the Pioneers, who posted an 18-11 mark last season and 13-5 record in the Northeast conference.

"My biggest focus is on getting better everyday," Dacko said. "With the newness and kids playing different positions everyday in practice, we are going to have our share of knocks. But the most important thing is if we learn for our mistakes and grow."

What is most anticipated for the contest against Sacred Heart is how the Minutewomen are going to execute the updated offensive system that the new skipper has instilled in the preseason. The new offense style is planned to breed a brand of basketball that is fast-paced with heavy defensive pressure and a lot of easy baskets resulting from a controlled fast break.

"I always think it is fun when you can do something new and different," co-captain Jen Butler said. "We are at a point right now where everything is new but its fun because everyone is just playing…nobody is holding back anymore."

Butler, in her senior season, says she has been anxiously waiting for the affair with Sacred Heart for a long time. Her determination for success in the UMass program wasn't anymore apparent than in the Minutewomen's one exhibition game against the Nor'Easter Storm – a 72-50 Maroon and White victory. The Brooklyn, N.Y. native tallied 19 points and 19 rebounds.

But Dacko wants to makes sure that everyone is involved in the offense this year.

"In the past this team depended on Jen Butler as the big scorer on the inside and [sophomore guard] Katie Nelson on the outside and the rest of the team had a role of not to shoot or undefined," she said. "I am trying to incorporate five people in the offense and I would love to have five players in double figures every game."

With a change in mentality of how the offense should operate, players that have did not see many touches under the leadership of O'Brien will be taking on a larger role. Fifth-year senior and co-captain Nekole Smith – one of those players – is excited for the opportunity to step up.

"Each day, we have been able to see how this system can work," Smith said. "It is a chance to something special and Friday night we will finally be able to try against competition."

Win would put the team over .500 mark

By Matt Brady

It has all the makings of a letdown.

The Massachusetts hockey team is coming off its first weekend sweep of a Hockey East opponent in three years, is feeling the pride of reclaiming the Alumni Cup for the first time in seven seasons and is lined up to play what should be its worst opponent of the season.

"It's natural that the game could be a letdown game," Head Coach Don Cahoon said. "I'd be disappointed, because we're a young team that knows it needs to make substantial gains to be able to play with the best teams in college hockey. There are guys fighting for playing time, guys trying to find themselves in terms of where they fit with the team.

"Having said that, it doesn't have the same sense of urgency going into this game that you would have going into a Hockey East game," he continued. "I think we'll have to wait and see and rely upon each player's own personal integrity and preparation as they come to the rink."

Cahoon's players seem far from afraid of playing down to their competition.

"You can't have a letdown game," sophomore forward Greg Mauldin said. "It's a pretty big game, actually, 'cause it would put us over .500. We want to come out there and play our best as if it was BC or somebody else."

The Iona Gaels (1-9-1, 1-6-0 Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference) enter tonight's game coming off their first win of the season, a 5-4 overtime victory over fellow MAAC squad Mercyhurst. It was by far the best offensive output of the season for the Gaels, who have scored just 16 goals in their 11 games.

Iona was led by freshman defenseman Ryan Swanson, who put up three points in the two games – including the first Gael power play tally in 40 man advantages – to win MAAC Rookie of the Week honors. Tim Knaeckl notched the game-winner for Iona 41 seconds into OT. He leads the team with four assists and six points. Ryan Manitowich is atop the team in goals with four, and notched a tally late in the third to put Iona up on Mercyhurst 4-3.

Freshman netminder Ian Vigier has upped his play as of late, stopping more than 90 percent of the shots he has faced. He stopped 23 of 24 shots in his 30-plus minutes of action and was relieved by Mike Fraser after getting hit in the mask.

"They are fairly physical," Cahoon said. "They're a team that's trying to shape themselves, they graduated a lot of players last year, so they're young as well."

The Minutemen (4-4-0, 3-3-0 HE) have taken three of their last four from conference opponents to vault into a tie for third place with six points. Thomas Pock notched four points on the weekend from the blueline, and earned HE Player of the Week honors for his effort. Stephen Werner (2g, 2a), Tim Turner (2g, 2a), Greg Mauldin (2g, 1a) and Chris Capraro (1g, 2a) played pivotal roles in

Annual ski sale on now

THE SKI 'N' BOARD CLUB IS HOLDING THEIR 34TH ANNUAL SKI SALE IN THE GRAND BALLROOM OF THE STUDENT UNION. THE SALE, WHICH WILL END SATURDAY, OFFERS A WIDE VARIETY OF SKI AND BOARD EQUIPMENT.

By David C. Grant
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts Ski 'N' Board Club is holding its 34th annual ski sale, which kicked off yesterday morning in the Student Union Ballroom. Over $3 million worth of equipment is available up to 50-70 percent off the regular price.

The sale will go from 11 a.m. to 8 p.m. today and 11 a.m. to 6 p.m., Saturday.

George Halkett and his family drove down early from Greenfield to beat the crowd, which had been waiting outside the ballroom since before the sale even began.

"We came to buy our son a snowboard for Christmas and he needs to be here to try different sizes," said Halkett, who kept his son from school yesterday to attend the sale.

"I just moved up here from Florida and I need a winter jacket," said Renea Drew, a junior psychology major and among the many waiting for the doors to open yesterday.

The sale attracts people from all over the region, according to Kate Capistron, the club's trips coordinator.

Two of the shops involved in the sale this year are Ski-In, of Wilbraham, and Competitive Edge of Hadley.

"It was a lot of work getting all this equipment in here, but it's worth it," said Charlie Canalizo of Competitive Edge.

"We couldn't miss this event, it's right in our own backyard," Canalizo said.

The first day of the sale saw students trying on goggles, sizing up snow boots and getting information on different kinds of snowboards from the many experts on hand to assist with the sale.

"I'm getting a whole ensemble at a really good deal," said Whately resident Wendy Wroblewski, a UMass alumna.

The sale serves as the club's major fundraiser for the year and 15 percent of all the proceeds go to the club. Capistron noted that last year the club pulled in $6,000 from the sale.

"The money helps pay for the transportation for our trips," Capistron said.

According to Capistron, the Student Government Association funds the club with $5,000 a year, which is not enough to pay for the trips. There are approximately 200 members in the Ski 'N' Board Club.

As a long time participant in the event, Walulak, owner of Ski-In, said the first day had been pretty good.

"I've been involved with the sale for all 34 years," Walulak said. "It's a pleasure working with the kids and helping them raise money for their trips."

Walulak said he was unsure what kind of sales to expect this year due to last season's low snow total.

"People base their purchases on what happened last year, it's always been like that," Walulak said.

Capistron said that members have been putting in a lot of work and have had little sleep preparing for the sale.

"We all have been working really hard to put on this sale," she said.

The club has planned a trip to Quebec from Dec. 6-8 and has six other trips planned for the spring semester.

The club has also taken over Earthfoods Cafe where information tables are set up and a raffle is being held throughout the sale. The drawing will be held Saturday and the winner will receive free lift tickets.

Environmentalist speaks about Earth Democracy

By Hirak Shah
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Environmentalist Dr. Vandana Shiva spoke last night in Memorial Hall on "Earth Democracy and Globalization." Shiva's visit was the second annual Interdisciplinary Seminar in the Humanities and Fine Arts lecture, and her lecture dealt with ISHA's current theme of sustainability and stewardship.

Shiva spoke about corporations trying to privatize resources in third world countries.

"Campaign against terror is about corporate security," Shiva said. "Corporate globalization is a means of terror."

Earth democracy is "thinking about how to deal with unsustainable systems," Shiva said. "Maintenance in life on Earth should be the main objective."

Shiva scorned what she called the, "unholy alliance" between government and corporations, saying that it works by government taking away power from people and giving it to corporations.

In her lecture, she spoke about India and how global corporations have tried to privatize seeds that are used for crops to water from the "sacred" rivers of India. She mentioned that many people starve due to patenting of seeds because they need to sell all their crops to make up the money that is used for a patent. When asked to describe the Earth Summit in Johannesburg she said it was very harsh, and angry.

She also mentioned such organizations as the World Trade Organization and the World Bank who continue to promote globalization, which in her opinion, is bad for the earth.

Shiva is the Director of the Research Foundation for Science, Technology and Natural Resource Policy, which is a network of researchers specializing in sustainable agriculture and development. She is also the Ecology Advisor to the Third World Network, which aims to bring a greater voice for people in the Third World along with fair and ecologically sustainable distribution of world resources.

She spoke of some of her experiences in India, where in 1982 she helped to establish The Research Foundation for Science, Technology and Ecology, which is an independent institute in India to help further community action, and social movements. In 1991, she founded Navdanya, a national movement to protect diversity and integrity of living resources, especially native seeds.

Shiva's books, The Violence of Green Revolution, and Monocultures of the Mind, have become basic paradigms of agricultural production. Shiva has also won national and international recognition on her contributions to gender issues. Her book, Staying Alive, sheds a different perception of third world women, and in 1990 she wrote a report for United Nations' Food and Agriculture on women and agriculture titled Most Farmers in India are Women. Recently, she has initiated an international movement of women working for food, agriculture, parents, and biotechnology called Diverse Women for Diversity.

Shiva has lectured internationally as well. She has also worked as an advisor to governments in India and abroad as well as such organizations as International Forum on Globalization, the Women's Environment and Development Organization and the Third World Network. She recently spoke at the Earth Summit in Johannesburg, South Africa.

Shiva was very walked received by the audience who broke out in applause several time to certain statements that she made.

Mayer squares off at Mullins Center

By Lizzy Nielsen
COLLEGIAN STAFF

John Mayer is rolling into Amherst in support and to promote his most recent release, Room For Squares, on Saturday night at the Mullins Center.

Mayer, a Connecticut native and one-time student at the Berklee College of Music in Boston, began his musical career at age 13 when he was given his first guitar. Two years later, he was blowing audiences away at local blues clubs. He enrolled at Berklee at age 19 and soon realized that he was more interested in playing music than studying it.

Room For Squares is actually Mayer's sophomore release, with his debut entitled Inside Wants Out, which caught the attention of Columbia Records. Squares was then revamped, but still showcased Mayer's superior songwriting skills and able guitar playing.

Room For Squares is currently sitting pretty at number 40 on the Billboard Hot 200, after peaking mid-summer at number 15 during his nationwide headlining tour.

In a world of choreographed pop stars, Mayer snuck onto top 40 radio circuit with his catchy anthem to chasing your passions after high

Chatting with singer/songwriter John Mayer

By Samara Mayberstone
COLLEGIAN STAFF

So, picture this. Here I am, sitting on my black futon with a pen and white looseleaf paper laying on my left, and my purple portable phone being tightly squeezed by my right hand. Oh yeah, don't let me forget to mention how nervous I was. You would think that I was waiting for a cute guy to call me, but that's kind of half true. I was actually waiting for John Mayer to call and chat a little bit about himself.

The phone rang and I immediately picked it up, only to learn that it was his publicist and two other girls from Fairfield and Temple University. Once his publicist hindled the phone over to him and said "Hey Samara," in his deep, smooth voice.

"It's nice to know that I can talk about my new record," Mayer said as he was asked to talk about his third album. After his hit album, Room for Squares, had exploded on the pop charts, he sounded quite excited to talk about what's to come in the near future. He described how he wrote a lot of songs on the road while touring for his current album, yet he still needs a solid block of time to create and experiment with new material. "It won't be done until it's right," Mayer added. "It's going to be more mature – wait, that was stupid. Why, would it be 'less' mature?" He then said that his new songs will be more electric than acoustic, and most importantly, "more suave."

I asked Mayer that if he could collaborate with any musical artist, dead or alive, who it would be. He paused for a second, and suggested that he would rather pick an artist who was alive, because if he picked one that was dead, it would be too easy. "I would love to work with Justin Timberlake, just so I can make his songs good," Mayer said, chuckling. He quickly added that he thinks that Timberlake is incredibly talented and that he would seriously love to collaborate with him, and hopes that it will happen.

"I'm happy to say that I can't relate to a lot of people's complaints about their record labels," Mayer said. "I feel like I'm in the Triple A league of mainstream."

He described he feels like he's still on

Budget allows longer hours

The staff at the W.E.B. Dubois library announced that they have expanded library hours for the rest of the semester.

The hours will be phased in over the next several days, according to Emily Silverman, communications specialist and a reference librarian at Dubois. "Essentially the schedule will expand by an hour at the beginning and the end of each day," Silverman said.

UMass administration funded the change in response to users complaining about the reduced hours. According to Silverman, the hours have not been restored in full, but have been increased.

The staff identified priority hours based on use statistics and users complaints and concerns. Silverman said that the library is continuing to look for ways to restore the library's hours completely.

The library is still trying to recover from a $5.4 million dollar budget cut that was made last spring. Chancellor John V. Lombardi restored $3.1 million to the library's acquisitions budget in September, but the more than a million dollar deficit has led to canceled journal subscriptions and other programs, such as the New York Times Book Review, getting cut.

The hours to the library had been cut 25 percent. The $3.1 million restored to the acquisitions budget had no effect on library hours at all.

Al-Qaida chief caught

By John J. Lumpkin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – U.S. authorities are interrogating the newly captured chief of al-Qaida's operations in the Persian Gulf in hopes of gaining information that might thwart terrorist attacks, officials said Thursday.

Abd al-Rahim al-Nashiri, a suspected mastermind of the USS Cole bombing in October 2000, was taken in an undisclosed foreign country during the last several weeks. The Saudi is now in U.S. custody, U.S. government officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Al-Nashiri was held briefly in Afghanistan before being flown to an undisclosed location, sources said.

He is probably the highest-ranking lieutenant of Osama bin Laden seized since the March capture of Abu Zubaydah, al-Qaida's chief coordinator of terrorist cells around the globe. However, the capture of al-Nashiri did little to quell fears of a resurgent al-Qaida that is plotting new terrorist attacks.

In its weekly bulletin Thursday to state and local law enforcement officers nationwide, the FBI warned that terrorists might try to attack shipping, possibly using scuba divers to put explosives on vessels. The warning was not based on any information about specific targets, a federal law enforcement official said.

Since last week, U.S. officials had said a senior al-Qaida leader had been caught, but they had declined to identify him.

Born in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, al-Nashiri is believed to be in his mid-30s, officials said.

"He has a reputation as a ruthless operator," said one U.S. official. "He is a very committed follower of Osama bin Laden."

Al-Nashiri oversaw the purchase and transport of explosives, the leasing of safe houses and the planning and financing of attacks, officials said.

The capture of al-Nashiri is the latest reported success in the worldwide effort being led by the CIA, FBI and U.S. military to capture or kill top al-Qaida chiefs.

Associated Press writers John Solomon and Robert Burns contributed to this report.

DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL/OPINION

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM ED/OP EDITOR: JAMIE LOO

Longer library hours: a good start

Even as our economy continues to falter and the University of Massachusetts continues to struggle with budget cuts made last spring, the library has announced an expansion in its hours for the remainder of the semester.

We at The Collegian could not be happier with the increase in hours and would like to thank administration for making something that should matter first a priority: our academics.

Students on campus have long held grudges as they watch where money gets spent on campus. Groups save money and earmark them for things like the Minuteman statue, leaving many students wondering why it couldn't have been put towards academia or a fundraiser to increase the overall pool of money.

Here, finally, students will notice a reversal in trend. Hours have been increased substantially across the board, with hours extended gradually until finals week. From Dec. 9 until Dec. 19, the library will be open from 7 a.m. until 2 a.m. This is nearly ideal. With all of the stress that students face and all of the studying that needs to be done between those days, students need and expect to have a library to go to. That the library hours were reduced is understandable – every facet of campus took some hit.

But that doesn't take away from the fact that the University has in some small way acknowledged students' needs, identified a problem and then addressed it.

That doesn't always happen here, making it all the more refreshing this time.

Students at the University of Massachusetts are by nature an angry, disgruntled lot disenchanted with state and campus politics. They distrust administration. They dislike feeling like they are being lied to or mislead.

This is what will make it so hard for students to register the decision as a favor. It is much easier to simply dismiss the University's act of good will as simple chance, or an entitlement. While students should have an accessible library on campus to aid in their academic development, the fact that hours at DuBois have been increased in face of a budget crisis, show's at least some semblance of commitment to the student body.

The increase in library hours is a good move, but it is only a step. The administration, from Chancellor Lombardi all the way down to each of the workers in Whitmore, must continue to find ways to improve the life on this campus, both academically and socially, to attract prospective students and enhance the surroundings of current ones.

We as students must in return, show our appreciation to the University for this act that is of benefit primarily to us. UMass has done something to make our lives better and help us in the struggle that is college. It is now our responsibility to not only seek out other improvements, but also to say thank you for that which has been done.

If we can all work together with a unified purpose of improving the campus, effective changes can be made. This may only be the hours of the library, but it's a start.

Sleep with one eye open

MUNAYYER

Well apparently the FBI is on our campus. Not surprising if you ask me – maybe disturbing, but definitely not surprising. It is terrible that our own professors are being interrogated. What is becoming of our rights and our civil liberties? And also why is UMass paying a federal employee? UMass students ask for an Escort Service and instead they get the FBI snooping around their professors. Someone call the Sprint commercial guy because I don't think we are getting through clearly.

But like I said, I am not surprised. In fact, I would not be shocked to hear that the FBI has had a close watch on our campus for quite some time now. However, we need to draw the line once our faculty begins to get unjustly interrogated. Maybe it's just me but I don't think that the FBI is going to find many "evildoers" here at UMass. Maybe they might find some anti-war protesters and some Free Tibet activists- but if they're looking for Osama or the like he isn't here.

The real issue here is civil liberties. We as people have been granted certain rights that we need to hold and protect. No one should have to put up with an unreasonable search or seizure. No one should have to put up with discrimination. And no one should have to put up with violations of privacy. So what is the FBI doing on our campus any way? Well, it's all part what is going to come.

Not many people have heard of the Homeland Security Act. Not many people have heard of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court of Review (but that's OK because they are hoping you don't find out about it). This court has been around for sometime but only passed its first ruling recently. Jimmy Carter established the court when he gave executive order 12139 after the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act was passed in 1978. The court was created so that it could have the power to issue surveillance orders without probable cause. The court is fairly formal and has three judges serving. One of those judges has to be from the court district of Washington, D.C., and the chief justice of the Supreme Court, William Rehnquist, appoints them all.

So what has this court done? Well, up until recently, nothing. But just this week, it ruled for the first time in its history. The ruling it made gave the Attorney General the right to suspend any Fourth Amendment rights and listen in to any phone calls, e-mails and conversations. This is scary because the government is becoming too involved with our lives and is tearing up one of the fundamental parts of the Bill of Rights. Remember, when drafting the Constitution many of our founding fathers did not want to sign it unless the Bill of Rights was included because they felt the people needed to be guaranteed certain inalienable rights. Right now they are flipping in their graves.

"Does anyone else remember that this is a guy who ran against a corpse and lost?"

Also I'm disturbed at the fact that Attorney General John Ashcroft now has this power. He has already shown that he has no interest in civil liberties and is ready to continue tearing up the Bill of Rights. Does anyone else remember that this is a guy who ran against a corpse and lost? That's right. The people of Missouri would rather vote for a dead man then put this guy in office. Shouldn't that tell us something? You know you are in trouble when the office of Attorney General becomes a consolation prize for people who lose elections to the deceased.

Now the Homeland Security Act will reach the president's desk and he will be happy to sign it. This act enables the creation of a program called Total Information Awareness. What this means is everything you ever do the government will know about, every word you speak, type or send will be fair game. There is nothing stopping the government from videotaping your entire life.

John Poindexter plans on spearheading the effort to create the largest dossier of information ever created so that the government always has their eye on you. This is brought to you by the same people who brought you the Iran Contra. (If you don't know what that is, I'm not going to explain it but just think. Iran and Contra, those two words together can't mean anything good, right?)

So if you thought the NSA was cool because they filtered out every phone conversation for processing that included the word "bomb" (and yes that means if you said 'Yea, so, he's du bomb" on the phone, someone in Washington probably listened in) you haven't seen anything yet. Poindexter is leading the revenge of the nerds and is getting all of them together to for a secret police that would make Hitler and Stalin salivate at first sight.

This isn't just something to think about or be concerned about, this is something that is here and now. The fourth amendment is no longer a right, it has become a privilege and the Attorney General will decided whether or not you can have it.

And for all of you FBI, KGB, CIA, KKK, NSA, SS or other acronym obsessive spies out there who are reading along, I want you to know one thing:

I'm watching you!

Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian Columnist.

What are his reasons?

Just what is Bush's plan on Iraq? What does he hope to accomplish? I've been doing some thinking on this issue and I'd like to share my thoughts with you all. First, he definitely has some goal; perhaps to simply boost his political position, perhaps to make Iraq less of a threat, perhaps to remove the sanctions. As a high-level politician, he wouldn't do something like this on a lark. He must have a very definite goal in mind.

I do not think that goal is purely political advantage. You might think he is callous, and thinks only of himself, but it takes a very extreme degree of callousness to send your subordinates, American soldiers, off to die. That is something it is hard to blind yourself to. It is feasible to blind yourself to the effects of misspent money, but blinding yourself to the deaths that happen in war is not something Bush can do. Nor do I think he is callous enough to do that.

Most people believe in what they are doing, which makes me a bit less likely to suspect the worst of Bush's motives. He probably believes, at least somewhat, that Iraq is a real threat. Also, if there were no motive but political gain, I would think there would be a little more friction within the administration. I don't think all of them, especially Colin Powell, would go along unless there was some better motive.

Why does Bush seem so extremely bent on war with Iraq, so hawkish? This seems very much like standard brinksmanship. The goal is to get the other guy to back down. Brinksmanship is like a game of chicken; you're each driving toward each other, and the goal is to make the other guy chicken out, and swerve out of the way. If no one swerves, there's a collision. But here, Bush is driving a truck, and Saddam is on a bicycle, so in a collision, Saddam will fare far worse. It is a principle of brinksmanship that It works best if you convince your opponent that you are crazy, and have no intention of swerving in any event.

People like Saddam can tell the difference between a credible threat, and words which will not be followed up with action. As such, simply threatening Iraq is not likely to work. It is necessary to do the work you would do if you were going to war. This means saying things to gain public support, such as all the Saddam bashing Bush is doing. Here we do have a very credible threat. Saddam is not insane. He may hate the United States, but he cares more for his own skin. If he sees no other way, he will probably back down. If he doesn't, then he gets pounded. You don't get to be, and stay, a dictator without a good bit of cunning and self-preservation.

The strategy of brinksmanship has been well-researched in foreign policy circles, so it would be quite available to Bush and his advisors. The thought of the situation being

"Bush mad at Iraq; Bush smash!" seems a little too simplistic for these people. I'd expect high-level politicians to have a more complex and cunning plan, a deeper strategy.

Consider this scenario: suppose Bush's plan is to remove the sanctions from the Iraqi people. You may think that unlikely but just imagine it as a possibility for the purpose of this argument. We could remove sanctions without getting concessions from Iraq, or we could try to get concessions and remove them. Getting no concessions seems like a bad plan; Saddam will do what he can get away with, and if we just ease up on him, he very well may build biological and chemical weapons. Thus we must get some credible concessions before lifting sanctions. How can we get concessions?

Saddam is not likely to budge with anything less than force or the threat thereof. Also, the international community isn't very motivated on the issue. The United Nations wouldn't have gotten around to the resolution they made unless the United States was pushing very hard for it. Pushing very hard means threatening to go to war with Iraq, a credible threat, with the Pentagon drafting the plans, the House resolution, and the building of public support.

It looks like it might work, Saddam might yield, and we may be able to lift the sanctions without war. This may be the best way to lift the sanctions and help the Iraqi people. If Bush acted less extreme, then Saddam might not yield, and we wouldn't get a good chance to lift the sanctions.

Espionage has already been looked at as well. There is not enough organized opposition to use in supporting a revolt; and assassination is very difficult, against U.S. law, and might have been tried (obviously without success).

It is not easy to determine what our President's true motives are. As with any action in the political realm, the views of people are open to personal interpretation. History will reveal what his true goals are. Until then, let the conjecture continue.

Green skies and blue pastures

The following is Eduardo Bustamante's fictionalized account of a dialogue between himself and Ron Unz, chairman of the English for the Children Campaign to end bilingual education.

Unz looked Bustamante straight in the eyes, but Bustamante did not cower. He knew of Unz's power and his past conquests, yet he had no fear. I knew this would be good, for I know how Unz plays his games and how crude and stubborn Bustamante can be.

EDUARDO BUSTAMANTE

"Bustamante."

"Yes Unz."

"If I wanted to, I could change the way you teach your kids. In fact, I may very well do it just to show you I can."

"Unz, my friend, if you will forgive my saying so, that's the stupidest idea I've heard in a long time. You may have been successful in California, but the voters in Massachusetts are different. You couldn't be more out of touch with them. You are a multi-millionaire, while most voters are not. You are from the Southwest and don't understand Northeastern values. You are a conservative republican and Massachusetts is a liberal democratic state. You are a xenophobe and this state is proud of its diversity, and unaffected by Mexican immigration."

Unz raised his pinks to his lips, smirked and broke out into evil laughter. "You don't understand Bustamante. I have a vision for white America and I plan to see it through."

"Unz, I have news for you. We live in a democracy, and you aren't even entitled to one vote here in Massachusetts."

"Bustamante, I understand that you think you have a voice that everyone has a voice. But I'm going to let you in on a little secret: in this democracy, we, the rich, can get loud enough to make your puny voice inaudible." His smile revealed the joy Unz took in posturing to teach one of his lessons.

"There are four pillars of power in this country – Education, Politics, Business, and Media, and we, the rich, control them all. As long as the power of these pillars is harnessed in combination, it doesn't matter if I am right or wrong. I can impose my will on you."

"Unz, you are a rich business man, which means you only hold power within one of those pillars. I can see how you could keep me from getting a job in certain circles, but you aren't entitled to any greater say in law, education, or media than I."

"Bustamante, I have a distinct advantage in the making of policy. I have the money to finance statewide campaigns for them. With a few dozen people working full time, it won't take me long to get a few thousand signatures on your so-called liberal state. I will call this one 'English for the children' and I will dedicate it to you. It will make sure that children forget any language other than English. That way, when my grandchildren walk this great nation, they won't have to hear any foreign languages. I know this one will work. After all, who would dare oppose an initiative for English? Or children?"

"Unz. You will still have to get the people to vote for a law that isn't in their best interest. People will look at your English immersion program and realize that it is silly to put a rigid time period on learning, because not all kids learn at the same pace. They will realize that you have no qualifications as a language teacher, and that your program has failed miserably in the states that have passed it."

"After all, who would dare oppose an initiative for English? Or children?"

"Bustamante, you are being naive. That's where the media, my third pillar, comes into play. People won't get objective information about my initiative, because their source of information won't give it to them. First, the media is owned by a handful of rich men (Rupert Murdoch, Ted Turner) and they have agendas just like anyone else.

"Second, the media makes money from political advertisements, causing a basic conflict of interest. If they report objectively on the issues and the candidates then there will be no need for politicians to advertise, and the media wouldn't make any money. As long as I use my monies to advertise, they won't cover any issue objectively and with the right amount of misinformation, I can make this law, or anything else I desire, pass and control education – the final pillar."

"People will see through your ads."

I agreed with Bustamante until I saw the ad. Unz clicked a button on his remote control unit, and his 50-inch plasma flat screen TV of his entertainment system presented a clip that amazed us all. An image appeared of a 60 to 70-year old man, the embodiment of a veteran military officer. Dressed conservatively, holding a book, the man addressed a room of children in the most hoarse and sinister German imaginable. Unz had hired an ad agency to create an image designed to associate foreign languages with fear and intimidation. At the end of the ad, a firm, soft voice spoke soothingly. "Is this what you want your child's classroom to be like? Vote yes on 2."

I'm sure even Bustamante was prepared to vote yes on 2. Unz's ad agency had managed to exploit the negative associations tied in with Nazi Germany. It didn't matter that it had nothing to do with the actual bill. That is the power of modern advertising. People form opinions based on emotional associations rather than facts, especially when they aren't paying much attention, as when viewing ads.

"Unz," Bustamante started, "that ad is misleading. Why would you knowingly undermine democracy? What makes you think that your views should supercede everyone else's? You presume much to believe that you, a businessman, having control of media, education, and politics, is the best thing for our country. Frankly, what I'm hearing from you reminds me of something Hitler once said: 'Anybody who sees and paints a sky green, and pastures blue, ought to be sterilized.'"

Unz simply laughed. "Bustamante, my friend, you will understand as you get older and become more conservative."

Over the next few weeks Bustamante protested, wore pins, and wrote newspaper articles urging people to vote no on 2, and he even did so himself. But in the end, the English Immersion Initiative passed by a 3 to 1 margin, a resounding victory for Unz.

I can't say what's good or bad though. Bilingual education certainly needed reform and there is a lesson to be learned from Unz. The fact is that we do not live in a democracy. Our country's major decisions are made by select groups of special interests. Businesses make our laws, educate our children, and are our primary source of "objective" information. Changing this is our challenge, and awareness is our first step.

By Johnny Donaldson

CRAZYTOWN
Columbia

Insane Clown Posse. Vanilla Ice. Limp Bizkit. Tommy Lee. Slipknot. This is just a small sampling of the rock and rap acts that are in no way capable of generating any kind of respect. All of them are just too laughable to be convincing. Oh, they try. They to play with the big boys, but they never amount to anything more than a joke band. To this list, you can add rap-rockers Crazytown.

When the band released their first album, The Gift of the Game, In the fall of 1999, they seemed like nothing more than Korn/ Bizkit wannabes that were destined for the remainder bin. The album's first two singles belly-flopped, and no one paid any attention to the record. Then they released "Butterfly."

The song, with its ultra-hooky chorus, seized the airwaves and shot to the top of the Billboard Hot 100. It made Crazytown a household names. "TRL" favorites, and rock superstars. The song was also genuinely good. "Butterfly" is a slinky, feline number that removes the misogyny that was the biggest component of most rap-metal tunes, and replaces it with a swinging beat and genuine romantic longing. Nothing else on The Gift of the Game came close to matching it, nor does anything on darkhorse, the band's sophomore set.

"Butterfly" put Crazytown in a precarious position. The song became a summertime favorite, but it also became one of the most overplayed songs on the radio and on MTV. The romantic sentiments in the song attracted a new audience to the group: preteen girls. Cries of sell-out resounded amongst the Ozzfest crowd, which began to drift away as Game found its way into the CD players off 13-year-old girls. But the rest of the album was far too reliant on the hackneyed booze-and-sex edicts of the genre tone of the songs was called "Only When I'm Drunk") – making it too hard for the "Butterfly" crowd. Reports of Crazytown MC Shifty Shellshock's battles with drug addiction hardly helped matters. When "Darkside," the follow up single, failed to make as big a splash as "Butterfly" Crazytown were looking at possible status as one-hit wonders.

Darkhorse doesn't do anything to eliminate the fact that Crazytown are tired retreads. The album is pretty much 13 tracks of limp, ridiculous mosh-pit posturing and weak rap. There are 11 tracks, plus two hidden bonuses ("Them Days" and "You're the One"), but only a couple decent songs on the album. One of the tracks is ironically entitled "Waste of My Time." My sentiments exactly.

Nothing on darkhorse is as bad as leader "Decorated," which has the distinction of possibly being one of the worst rock songs ever recorded. Whins vocals, an impotent rhythm section, lame lyrics, wimpy rap, an annoying chorus, weird sound effects in the background – Crazytown spare no expense in trying to drive the listener nuts. This sets down expectations that the album will be one of those shrill, painful exercises for the ear.

Thankfully, things turn a little better by "Hurt You So Bad." Actually, things become a lot better. "Bad" and "Drowning" are the two best songs on the entirety of darkhorse (granted, it's not saying much.) Neither of them are exactly two hugely great songs, but they are good songs nonetheless. "Bad" as a taut pull, while "Drowning" has some of the swirl of "Butterfly."

"Drowning" is the first single, and it is both a good and poor representation of the album – it's good because it's good, and poor because it hides the fact that the rest of the album is no great shakes.

Then the ear careens right off the cliff. Pull out "The Complete Idiot's Guide to Rap Metal," and you'll find all the formulas that permeate the genre. Primarily aiming all are the self pitying lyrics that demand everyone's attention toward the band's myriad problems. This is the chorus to "Change": "Something I wonder if It'll ever change/ Can I change?/ would I change?/ or am I always gonna be the same?" I blame the world for making me a freak. But the world wants to blame it on me."

Yeah, I don't care. There are throwaway stabs at maturity in some of the lyrics when the singers exhibits shit-luck and Brett Favre/ Mazuri feelings they have to grow up. But there's no maturity in the music. There are both shrieks screams and blandly bellowing instrumentation, or it's all angst and pain. Darkhorse takes on a stridency that makes it nearly impossible to listen to the album with even one ear. They call this a sophomore album for a reason – it feels rather adolescent.

CRAZYTOWN FOLLOWS UP ITS PLATINUM DEBUT, The Gift of the Game, WITH [illegible] AND FALLS INTO THE DREADED SOPHOMORE SLUMP.

Watch out Microsoft and Sega
Metroid puts Gamecube on the map

As of late, it seems that both X-Box and Playstation 2 have dominated the video game market. X-Box with its X-Box Only games, such as Halo and Metal Gear 2: Sustenance, and Playstation 2 just recently released Grand Theft Auto: Vice City. Since its release, Gamecube has been forced to the back corner of the shelf due to its lack of gaming power to draw consumers into buying it. However, as of Nov. 17, Gamecube went straight to prime time as it released the highly anticipated Metroid Prime.

The game was just released this weekend, however I have not had the funding to get my hands on a copy of it just yet. From the looks of the screen-shots and the reviews online, this looks to be "the one" for Nintendo. While some gamers may dispute that the Legend of Zelda Gamecube game will be a classic, Metroid Prime takes the cake in overall play. It has eye-popping graphics with no load time. That's right, you won't have to sit for hours on end waiting for the game to load up the next area onto the screen. This flowing system is based on a similar system used in the popular Soul Reaver games, but this one is far more complex to deal with the vast world of Metroid.

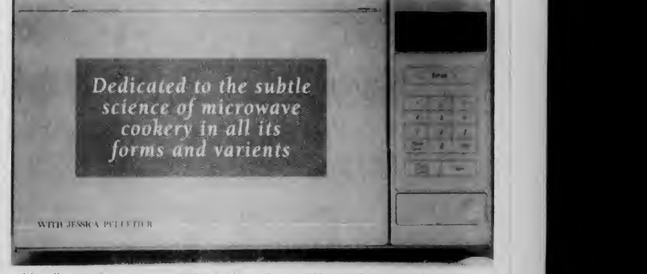
PRESS START TO PLAY

WITH REID DAVENPORT

From the screen shots, you may first assume it's simply a Metroid game as a first person shooter. Yet, the game is far more advanced than any other first person game on the market. Samus Aran starts her adventure in her normal red and gold power suit and comes equipped with her laser cannon and grappling beam. The thing that makes her more advanced to other first person characters is her array of weapons and her visor option. Throughout the game, you can uncover new visors that help you find secrets within the game. There's a normal visor, a scanning visor that puts your guard down but allows you to scan for hidden objects and collect data on objects in an area. You also can uncover a heat visor that allows you to view the body heat given off by enemies.

If you look at the instruction booklet, you may get worried that the control will be very confusing, but according to most gaming sites, it's very easy to learn after playing around with the game a few times. To also clear up the headache of most first person shooter- where you must manually aim at an enemy, Samus has an automatic aiming system at the touch of a button to allow for easier gameplay. The other feature that Samus carries over from past games is her ability to turn into a rolling ball. Much like past games, this ability will allow you to advance in the game as well as find secrets to unlock.

If you're looking for the faults within the game, there are virtually none to discourage the average gamer from picking up a Gamecube simply to play Metroid Prime. It is quite clear that the video gaming market has become diluted with games that get a lot of media hype, but are unable to fulfill a buyer's interest for any longer than a month. Metroid Prime's mind-blowing graphics and smooth game play could allow a player to replay the game over and over again. While most sites estimate it will take about 20 hours to complete the game, there are always secrets to find and you can also try the hard mode that is unlocked when you beat the game the first time. The only other known extra to the game is that if you hook up your Gameboy Advance to your Gamecube and you own Metroid Fusion, you can unlock the old school NES version of Metroid and you can wear Samus' suit from Metroid Fusion in Metroid Prime. In other words, don't blow your cash on a GBA just for this extra, most gaming sites say it's not worth getting if you don't already own both systems and games.



All in all, Nintendo seams to have finally hit a high note in the gaming industry with this game. Yy company known for dominating the gaming market over the past two decades, was seemingly heading the same direction that Sega went after Dreamcast failed as a system. However, with in their release of Metroid Prime, Nintendo Gamecube has found new life. Watch out Sony and Microsoft, Gamecube's going to go prime time on your behinds.

MICROLOGY

Virtually every food concoction in existence has some sort of quirks background to it. Some of these legends you probably know, some you may not, and others have been stolen and Americanized. Once and for all, let's get to the bottom of these legends, shall we? Each and every tale has been thoroughly researched and chronicled so don't chomp on my rump and tell me I'm wrong.

SANDWICH – Everyone knows the story of how the sandwich came into existence: young earl plays cards, wants food without a mess, puts meat between bread and our lives are changed forever. Regardless of the fact that this story isn't at all the first recording of the sandwich, history remembers this piece of culinary folklore. By the way, the earliest records are from the first century involving matzoh, apples, nuts, wine, and spices. The mixture was a rabbi named Hillel and the filling was representative of the mortar used by the Jews in their construction of Egyptian buildings. Later recordings come from the sixth through the 10th centuries and involved meats placed between large split rolls called trenchers and either eaten or thrown to dogs.

MOZZARELLA – Long ago on the forests of Italy a young dumb guilded would wander the fields and collect a food so fine it was immediately delivered to the gods who would consume it with relish (keep enjoyment, not the pickle) endment and then send her out each morning at the break of dawn to collect more. Her downfall occurs when she falls in love with a mortal man who steals the food and gives it to humans to enjoy. The result is banishment for the demi-goddess and for us it's the delicate white cheese, known as mozzarella. Taken from the milk of buffalos near Naples this type of cheese can only be purchased internationally. All mozzarella from the United States is basically cow milk with a little mixed with goat milk.

HAMBURGER – Somewhere in the middle of the century there's a man claiming that he crammed a meatball between a roll and named it after a hamburger. I can't say this shows as many level-headed as that origin of the hamburger comes from the Tartar tribe of Eastern Europe. Soldiers would tenderize their meat by placing it between their saddles and their horses and scream with delight and little cheer. Bear in mind that food was eaten raw. Today we call this little treat steak tartar and it remains raw (mmm, boy). When the treat caught on in Western Europe, the Germans cooked it and brought it to the United States. Hamburg was named after the region in Germany where some of these individuals came from and World War II anti-German prejudices led to its being christened "chopped sirloin" or a "Salisbury patty."

KETCHUP – The origins of ketchup lie in ancient China as a popular pickled-fish dish. It is derived from the word "ke-tsiap" and was popular due to the fact that it could be taken anywhere and wouldn't spoil for weeks. Our version of this dish was mentioned in Europe by the early 18th century, but has existed in various forms since the journeys of Marco Polo. Tomatoes, vinegar, sugar, salt, and spices make up the popular hot dog topping today and the ever popular Heinz Company of Pennsylvania was the first business to bottle and sell their ketchups in 1876.

DC talks dirt

Music makes hard work pay off as tunes fill the Campus Center

By Scott Enright
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Music played a significant role on the ninth floor of the Campus Center in last night's roundtable discussion "Dinning Commons Talking Dirt."

Helena Farrell, a senior BDIC major combining the studies of Political Ecology and Cultural Geography, sat in front of an audience of seven. A panel of five had just wrapped up a conversation about the lack of student involvement with food composting at the University of Massachusetts.

Will Savage, a senior BDIC major, was eager to explain why it had been important to involve music in the evening's event.

"That's where I am able to be inspired to shift my way of thinking," Savage said. "One of the ways of reaching an audience is through music and art."

The audience unanimously agreed.

"Life, and changing the world, is a celebration. Music is a celebration," Farrell said.

"I consider what we are doing in here as part of a larger social justice movement," Savage said. "I've seen a lot of people become burnt out. When you involve the arts and music, it gives it its freshness and fun. We are here to change the world. That art, that music, is creating the world we want to live in."

The movement last night to increase student awareness about composting issues was headed by Earthfoods, a student run vegetarian restaurant located on campus in the Student Union building. Lorenzo Macaluso, Special Project Coordinator for the University Office of Waste Management, Roberta Potter, Dining Commons Manager at Franklin Dining Hall, and the Gardenshare, a student organization that was recently given an acre plot of land designated for farming.

Farrell is a member of Gardenshare. Holding an acoustic guitar in her arms, she opened up the artistic creativity of the room with a few songs. Her set included covers of Bob Dylan, Indigo Girls and original material.

In an original, untitled song Farrell sang, "This is life and you are its reflection. This world is full of troubles but I will be strong. I will be strong."

Prior to the event she spoke about why playing music at something so serious as a panel discussion was a complimentary thing to do.

"Music opens up your senses and gets you to feel more. It is an aesthetic source of energy that gets people thinking and wanting to create," she said. "This is trying to make people more mindful about their abilities. I think that a lot of my words are kind of an explanation, an idea of how we could accommodate our lifestyles. To suit our needs that we have as individuals and as a community world wide."

At the event, she showed no shyness as she belted out some soulful lyrics to an intimate crowd. She maintained fluidity throughout her performance and provided inspiration for those who attended.

Hwei-Ling Greenes, an organizer to this event couldn't help but feel relieved after hearing Farrell's sweet voice. As Greeney left the room after the performance, she muttered under her breath just loud enough to hear, "I think music made all this work worth it."

UMass choir performs Belle of Amherst's poems Sunday

It is the last Sunday before Thanksgiving Break, and you've just woken up. You've managed to escape your hangover, and you've only got $5 left after the weekend. Need something sophisticated and fun to do?

Sunday Nov. 24 at 4 p.m. the University of Massachusetts Chamber Choir will perform the classic Emily Dickinson poems, "Musicians Wrestle Everywhere" and "Heart Not So Heavy As Mine."

Tickets are $3 for students, seniors and children under 18 and $10 for the general public.

Elliott Carter set Dickinson's poems to music in 1945. "The poems 'Musicians Wrestle Everywhere' are transcendental, a mystical vision of what the afterlife is like. Elliott really caught that transcendental idea, and what she (Dickinson) was getting at," said Dr. F. Wayne Abercrombie, director of the Choir and Head of the Choral Program for the Department of Music & Dance.

The choir will also perform Paul Halley's arrangement of Agnus Dei, with a special appearance by faculty member Lynn Klock on saxophone. His concert will include a very wide variety of work including: A romantic-period work for four voices by Johannes Brahms, Heinrich Schutz's early Baroque piece Selig sind die Toten, William Byrd's Mass for Four Voices and an arrangement of a Venezuelan folk song be Rene Rojas.

After already sleeping away half the day, it's still possible to hear some different styles of music, and best of all it will only cost you $5 to show some else how cultured you are.

Tickets can be purchased at the Fine Arts Center Box Office (413-545-2511).

WHEN ASKED IN A RECENT INTERVIEW ABOUT PERFORMING ON TOUR, SINGER/SONGWRITER JOHN MAYER SAID, "I LIKE MAKING PEOPLE FEEL LIKE IT'S JUST US AND [EXPLETIVE] EVERYBODY ELSE."

the outside of the pop world, even though it is evident that he's a pop artist. He mentioned that even though he is all over MTV and VH1, he's still not as popular as Nelly, Justin Timberlake, Britney Spears, etc.

"I still hope that the DJ pronounces my name right," he added. All in all, Mayer is grateful to be popular, yet is still outside the mainstream world. This enables him to live happily and quietly in New York, which provides him a "lasting little corner of the neighborhood to play his music in. If I were ever to visit the mainstream, I would get everyone out by pulling them by their collars."

When asked if he thought he would ever sell out, Mayer quickly responded by stating the fact that the term "sell out" has definitely lost its meaning. "I mean, I have a pop album. It's no Dark Side of the Moon," he concluded. The term "sell out" was created around the 1950s Pop era, and it definitely has lost its meaning since then."

He described how he never used to get nervous, but now that he's playing bigger shows, he does get a little anxious before walking on stage. "It's enough to keep me on the edge," Mayer said. He also added that he changed his show around to shake things up a bit. He now opens up his concerts by playing a few acoustic songs as he sits on a chair, with just his guitar in his hand. "It's great that I can sit on a chair and sing in front of 11,000 people and not wet myself."

It is rare that someone gets paid to do what he or she absolutely loves, so being that Mayer is part of the lucky few, I wanted to know exactly how he felt about this. He started off by saying that he doesn't have a sense of money because he's doing what he loves to do. He's happy that he doesn't have to call his mom once a week and beg for cash. "It's incredible that people will kill, lie, cheat, and steal for money, which is something that is so complacent," Mayer said. "Once you have it [money], you realize how much fun it's not."

Mayer gave a little preview of what to expect at his performance tomorrow night at the Mullins Center. "I like making people feel like it's just us, and [expletive] everybody else," Mayer said. He said something similar in an interview from People a couple of months ago, as he described his concerts as a "90 minute flirting session."

It was evident that he was extremely appreciative of his fame and success and at the same time, still has his feet on the ground and is keeping his head far from the clouds. "I never get lost from my work, and my head hasn't gone away from me," he said. To reach your ideal level of fame and success, Mayer mentioned, "You have to trade your dreams for what really happens." With that realistic attitude, it's no surprise that Mayer can equally balance his huge career and still is cool to hang out with his friends on the weekends. He's the ideal famous person, and that's probably due to the fact that being famous is the last thing on Mayer's mind.

Mayer's most recent hit, the breathtakingly romantic ode to relationships, "Your Body is a Wonderland," is currently sitting at number 29 on the Billboard top 100 singles in its fifth week on the chart, jumping from number 35 last week.

Mayer's lyrics are heartfelt and real, his music is personal and original, and sets him far apart from any other artist on top 40 radio today. In a world filled with electronically altered vocals and overly extravagant stage shows, seeing Mayer dressed in jeans and a T-shirt, on a stage with his band, his guitar seems like a victory for musicianship in mainstream music.

Mayer has found the majority of his success amongst people his own age, as his lyrics often identify with what twenty-somethings are thinking and feeling. With lyrics like "Welcome to the real world she said to me, condescendingly from his first radio hit and "Oh another casualty, score one from me," from "My Stupid Mouth," Mayer's lyrics are reflective of twenty-something sentiments, and express them through sweet and melodic song. From love and romance in "Wonderland," to heartbreak in "Mouth," to nostalgia in "1983," Mayer has the emotions of most people in their 20s covered.

Mayer has also broken open boundaries for other singer-songwriters to venture into American top 40 music. Artists like Howie Day and Matt Nathanson are finding that the atmosphere in mainstream music is much more accepting of musicians of their caliber.

Mayer will be serenading the Mullins Center this Saturday night with So Cal natives Nickelcreek. Concert time is set for 7:30 p.m., and tickets are still available at the Mullins Center box office for $30. Immediately following the concert, an after party will take place at the Monkey Bar in downtown Amherst. Valid ID is required.

Johnson denounced Martha Burk and the National Council of Women's Organizations for demanding a female member by the next Masters, in April.

The Masters already has dropped its three television sponsors to keep them out of the controversy, and he said two weeks ago there was no chance Augusta National would have a female member in the near future.

"This news is disappointing because the highly charged rhetoric on both sides of this issue has become a distraction and is damaging to the game of golf," Votaw said.

PGA Tour commissioner Tim Finchem refused to be drawn into the debate earlier this month during his state-of-the-tour message, saying only that the tour will continue to recognize the Masters as an official tournament.

Votaw said he has spoken with Finchem and Johnson recently, but said those conversations would remain private.

"To has broken ranks and that's good," Burk said Wednesday evening. "I think it's more significant than just one more voice. Because the LPGA is one of the ruling bodies, I hope it's going to increase the pressure on the PGA Tour to stop behaving hypocritically."

Augusta National donates more than $3 million a year to charities, and the LPGA Tour is among the beneficiaries. Karrie Webb and Kelly Robbins are among LPGA members who have played Augusta National this year.

"The Masters has been the LPGA's friend in many ways," Votaw said. "We respect and appreciate and want to acknowledge much of what the organization has done. But we cannot condone its stance on this issue."

The issue has not gone away, even as golf heads into its short off-season.

The New York Times wrote an editorial Monday suggesting that two-time defending champion Tiger Woods not play, and that corporate executives give up their membership.

Woods said from Japan the editorial was frustrating, because "I'm the only player they're asking. They're asking me to give up an opportunity no one has ever had – winning the Masters three years in a row."

During a conference call for the upcoming Skins Game, former Masters champions Mark O'Meara and Fred Couples agreed that it was unfair to single out Woods.

They also said they would continue to play in the Masters.

"I listen, I'm all for women's rights," O'Meara said. "I'm all for equal pay and for women doing as good a job as men. She's got my vote. But I think it's getting a little out of control."

In a letter to the Times published Thursday, Julian Bond, chairman of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said Woods "ought not to be expected to shoulder this burden alone."

"The NAACP believes that the athletes who play at discriminatory golf clubs endorse wrongful exclusion by their presence," Bond added. "Businesses that sponsor memberships and advertisers and broadcasters of club events subsidize and condone discrimination."

The Rev. Jesse Jackson said last week he would organize protests during the Masters if the club did not admit a female member, and encouraged players not to cross picket lines.

"I didn't even know he played golf or knew any golfers," Couples said. "I really can't speak on what he's trying to do. I can commend him for it. I think that's great. But I play golf for a living, and it's my favorite tournament.

"There is no way that I am not flying to Augusta in April and not playing at Augusta National. There is just no way."

O'Neal's playing status big game-time decision

By Beth Harris
ASSOCIATED PRESS

EL SEGUNDO, Calif. (AP) – Shaquille O'Neal could make his season debut Friday night, but if he plays he probably won't start the Lakers' home game against the Chicago Bulls.

O'Neal received a shoe support from his doctor Thursday to ease the pressure on his arthritic right foot, and he wore the device at practice.

"He said everything was OK," O'Neal said. "I played today, and I felt pretty good. We'll just see tomorrow. Tonight is the true test, when I'm sleeping."

Lakers spokesman John Black said O'Neal's availability will depend on how he feels after Friday morning's shootaround.

"We'll just hold our breath until tomorrow and find out what it's like and see how he responds after this practice," Coach Phil Jackson said. "He's had some swelling a little bit after practice, and he's had some soreness, but he doesn't have soreness while he's running, and that's the positive aspect."

Jackson said if O'Neal does return, he would play only about 24 minutes and probably would come off the bench.

"But he's going to be upset about that," Jackson said. "He already told me he would be."

Jackson said he urged O'Neal not to rush back, even though his presence would help the struggling NBA champions, who are off to a 3-9 start. They've lost seven of eight games and are last in the Pacific Division.

"If he felt that he has to get back out there, don't do it because of our record," Jackson said. "He's got to do it because he's healthy, and he feels right."

Even when O'Neal returns, Jackson said his influence would be limited at first.

"We're going to have to limit his minutes," he said. "We're not going to expect too much out of ourselves. We'll bring him along as best we can and progressively keep playing him as he improves."

Guard Derek Fisher said fans shouldn't expect the Lakers to surge to the top of the standings upon O'Neal's return.

"That doesn't mean we'll be the best basketball team in the league," he said. "We'll still have a lot of work to do."

However, O'Neal's presence would decrease the burden on Kobe Bryant, who's had to provide most of the scoring while being guarded closer than ever.

"Some nights he's done a great job and other nights he's struggled finding which way he wants to play the game," Fisher said.

Jackson said Bryant's role would change slightly.

"He's got to set the table a little bit more for the big guy and get the ball in to him," he said. "It's going to make it easier for him. He's not going to have to take as many tough shots."

O'Neal had surgery on his arthritic right big toe Sept. 11. At the time, he was expected to be out six-to-eight weeks.

Departing Celtics owner holding down costs

By Jimmy Golen
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) – When Celtics forward Kedrick Brown injured his toe, coach Jim O'Brien didn't ask for a replacement. He knew the owner's answer would be no.

Brown had already missed 10 games with a sprained ankle, and all that time, the Celtics had just 11 healthy players on the roster. Signing another would cost a prorated portion of the league minimum salary – about $500,000 – and owner Paul Gaston won't do it, even though the team will have to practice short-handed for another month.

"Quite frankly, we're used to it," O'Brien said.

The NBA's most decorated program is on an austerity plan these days as it struggles to meet Gaston's directive to avoid the league's luxury tax. The problem: It's not clear at what level the tax kicks in, so teams like Boston are avoiding payroll whenever possible to stay out of range.

"Some owners are richer than other owners. They can afford to blow paper like Mark Cuban," Celtics guard Paul Pierce said of the Dallas Mavericks owner. "I don't really know the numbers. To say this is a cheap team? There's only so much you can do with the salary cap and the luxury tax."

The NBA's agreement with the players creates a tax on team payroll over a certain amount, which is expected to be between $51 million and $54 million when it is calculated next summer. Anything over that threshold will be taxed dollar-per-dollar; that is, signing a $300,000 fill-in for Brown would cost another $300,000 in taxes.

But there's also a commissioner's fund that distributes the taxes as well as other money that's being withheld from players' paychecks, among the teams with lower payrolls. Teams that pay the luxury tax could be out millions more if they lose their share of that.

Pond said he is annoyed by the focus on the Celtics' recent frugality, noting that they are well over the salary cap and one of a handful of teams with as many as three players – Pierce, Antoine Walker and Vin Baker – making the maximum salary.

At about $52.5 million, Boston is in the middle of the pack in total player salaries. So, it's not as if the Celtics are being run on the cheap.

Pond also pointed out that this is also the first year of Pierce's maximum deal, intensifying the pressure on the payroll. Through a Celtics spokesman, Gaston declined to comment; he has not granted interviews since announcing in September a plan to sell the team for $360 million, a deal that could close by the end of the year.

"The reality is, we know what our limits were when we signed Paul. We knew it would have a significant impact on our flexibility in the future," Pond said. "But we did it, and we'd do it again. I'd rather have Paul Pierce than five other players."

Still, what Pond cannot ignore is that the first and most vocal critic of the new thriftiness has been O'Brien.

The Celtics' coach campaigned for the team to re-sign Rodney Rogers over the summer, which would keep intact the team that went to the Eastern Conference finals last season. But O'Brien was unable to persuade Gaston to authorize anything more than short money, and Rogers signed with the New Jersey Nets for three years and $9 million.

Instead, the Celtics traded for Vin Baker in a five-player deal that brought down the team's 2002-03 payroll but adds another $45 million in long-term money that will handcuff Boston until 2006.

"I'd cost us a good player in the offseason, but it's something we can't do anything about now," Pierce said. "So why worry about it."

Horoscopes

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – The most common first move in chess is E2, E4. Next time someone challenges you to a competition, immediately say "E2, E4." This will prove that you are a worthy adversary.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You will find yourself incredibly annoyed when your mom replies "LOL" to your request for more money. Sign off without typing "BRB."

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You will be incredibly surprised when a little person named Hector tells you that you look like the fat kid from "Head of the Class." Offer him a piggyback ride.

PISCES (Feb. 19-Mar. 20) – Seek out an old friend and tell them why you stopped talking to him or her. This will relieve stress and then you can go and sit home, alone.

ARIES (Mar. 21-Apr. 19) – Your roommate will begin to wonder why all the milk is disappearing so quickly. You will claim not to know, but do not let them know that you are keeping a cat in your closet.

TAURUS (Apr. 20-May 20) – You will feel a sudden urge to watch "A Wedding Story" on television. Indulge yourself and spend the day with personal TLC.

GEMINI (May 21-Jun. 21) – Today you will be upset at someone, so use this little trick to calm yourself down. [Editor's Note: Due to Jack Handey's penchant for copyright infringement litigation, this portion of the horoscopes have been removed] After that you will feel a lot better, and no harm done.

CANCER (Jun. 22-Jul. 22) – You will be disgruntled early today, but that feeling will be replaced by a vague sense of grumpiness, followed by severe grouchiness. All in all, one of your better days.

LEO (Jul. 23-Aug. 22) – You will be accosted by a talking moose. The moose will actually turn out to be an old woman from South Carolina dressed up as a moose. She will ask you to spare some change out of pity. Don't give her any.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sep. 22) – You suddenly realize that the person sitting next to you while reading this is the same one (or many) you hooked up with freshman year. Smile and just walk away.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You will move out of your current residence and into a room with two sets of bunk beds. You will realize it was the best move you made in your life.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Patience must be a virtue for those that love Scorpios. Always remember that.

UMass set for Big East power

By Jeff Boyd
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

One of the defining characteristics of a champion is the ability to improve on the failures of the past. This weekend will give the defending Atlantic 10 champion, Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team, a chance to do just that.

A win on Saturday against St. John's in Jamaica, N.Y. would improve UMass' record to 3-0 while avenging one of only three losses from last season.

With convincing victories over New Hampshire and Boston University behind them, the Minutemen will arrive in New York riding a wave of confidence and success. However, the Maroon and White may need more than confidence and an undefeated record to overcome a St. John's team that currently stands at 4-0.

"I was really pleased with the way we swam, especially against BU because we didn't have all of our guys," Head Coach Russ Yarworth said. "The kids who play water polo on the club team were out at nationals, so it was really good to see some other guys step up."

Those members of the club water polo team who missed the meet against BU will be back in the lineup for UMass on Saturday. A strong lineup will be critical if the Minutemen wish to be competitive against a St. John's team that is saturated with talent.

The Red Storm's roster boasts several international recruits, and their program is granted the maximum number of scholarships allowed by the NCAA. This not only explains their undefeated record, but also gives them an unmistakable advantage over the Minutemen.

"St. John's is much stronger [than UNH and BU]," Yarworth said. "They're not even in the same league, it's like a whole different ballpark."

Two weeks removed from competition, UMass will rely on the same things that have constituted its success when they face St. John's.

A major contributor to the Minutemen's success has been sophomore Dylan Smith, who was named the Dunn Brothers UMass Athlete of the Week following the win at BU. Against the Terriers, Smith posted victories in the 100-yard backstroke (54.80), 200-yard backstroke (1:57.14), and 100-yard butterfly (52.37). Smith, along with the rest of his teammates, will have to exhibit an equivalent performance if they hope remain successful this weekend.

"He [Smith] was on," Yarworth said. "He's been on at practices too. He's doing some things in workouts that I don't ask a lot of swimmers to try."

Physical preparation has been something that Yarworth and his swimmers have taken pride in throughout their run of A-10 championships. Tri-captain Justin Houck believes that mental preparation might be the key to defeating St. John's this weekend.

"Last year we went into the meet not as mentally prepared as we should have been," Houck explained. "This year we are a little more focused."

St. John's reputation for success and undefeated record might intimidate many of its opponents. The Minutemen, however, remain confident and optimistic about their chances against this Big East powerhouse.

When tri-captain Ryan Zowcha was asked if he and his fellow Minutemen could beat St. John's, he confidently responded: "Of course we can. We're UMass!"

Packers, Bucs playing with eye to home-field

By Dave Goldberg
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Green Bay Packers could have clinched the NFC North with a win last week. They didn't, and this week they go to Tampa in a game that could help determine whether Green Bay gets to spend the playoffs at Lambeau Field.

The Packers and Bucs share the NFL's best record (8-2) heading into their first non-division meeting since Tampa Bay joined the old NFC Central in 1977.

The Bucs are favored by three points, which is the home field being edge.

Folks in Florida seem to be getting excited about their team. Someone even asked coach Jon Gruden on Monday if it will be the biggest game of his career.

"Yesterday's game has been the biggest game that I have ever been involved in," replied Gruden, who two years ago at Oakland coached in a legitimately big game, for the AFC championship.

"I'm sure this one will be the biggest I've ever been involved in because that's just how it is. Every Sunday is the same feeling to me."

Despite Gruden's offensive expertise, his Bucs are performing in much the same way as they did under defensive-minded Tony Dungy; they win with defense. They could be vulnerable to Brett Favre this week because Ronde Barber, their best cornerback, has a broken thumb and will be hampered if he plays at all.

This series definitely has a home flavor to it. Since 1998, the Packers and Bucs are 4-4 against each other, with the home team winning every game.

It then meet in January, the Bucs very much want not to go to Green Bay. They have yet to break their losing streak in cold weather -21 straight in temperatures under 40 degrees.

That's enough incentive.

Augusta owes it to golf to invite ladies

By Doug Ferguson
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. (AP) – LPGA Tour commissioner Ty Votaw urged Augusta National to admit a female member, saying its obligation to golf outweighs its rights as a private club.

The LPGA Tour is not involved with the Masters. Votaw said he wanted to make his position clear because, "We represent not just women, but the game."

"Augusta's exclusionary practices with respect to women speaks volumes," he said Wednesday at the season-ending ADT Championship. "The message it sends is that women cannot be part of that face of golf. And that's wrong."

He said the club's decision to treat race differently from gender is "perpetuating golf's exclusionary past and the perception that golf is elitist and exclusionary."

Club spokesman Glenn Greenspan disagreed. He said single-gender groups like Augusta National and the LPGA are "legally and morally proper."

"It is clear that millions of Americans both support and belong to these organizations," Greenspan said.

The LPGA Tour excludes men from competition, and Votaw said that would continue because of the physical differences between men and women.

However, he has recommended that his board of directors accept men as members of the LPGA Teaching and Club Pro division, which has 1,200 members.

The debate over Augusta National's all-male membership escalated in July when club chairman Hootie

Iraq: inspections give U.S. pretext for war

By Charles J. Hanley
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — In a point-by-point protest, the Iraqi government complained to the United Nations Sunday that the small print behind the weapons inspections beginning this week will give Washington a pretext to attack.

The new U.N. resolution on the inspections could turn "inaccurate statements (among) thousands of pages" of required Iraqi reports into a supposed justification for military action, Foreign Minister Naji Sabri said in a letter to U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan.

"There is premeditation to target Iraq, whatever the pretext," Sabri said.

His lengthy letter, a detailed commentary on the Security Council resolution, was not expected to affect the inspections, which resume Wednesday after a four-year suspension. Iraq had accepted the resolution in a Nov. 13 letter from Sabri to Annan.

Preparations moved steadily ahead on Baghdad's outskirts Sunday, where technicians at the U.N. inspection center worked to establish a "hot line" with liaisons in the Iraqi government. The first working group of 18 inspectors arrives Monday on a flight from a U.N. rear base in Cyprus. Their numbers are expected to swell by year-end to between 80 and 100 at a time in Iraq.

In seven years' work after the 1991 Gulf War, U.N. experts destroyed large amounts of chemical and biological weapons and longer-range missiles forbidden to Iraq by U.N. resolutions, and dismantled Iraq's nuclear weapons program before it could build a bomb. The inspections were suspended amid disputes over U.N. access to Iraqi sites and Iraqi complaints the United States inserted spies in the inspection teams.

A new focus on Iraq by the Bush administration led to adoption of Resolution 1441 and the dispatch of inspectors back to Iraq with greater powers of unrestricted access to suspected weapons sites. Washington alleges Iraq retains some prohibited weapons and may be producing others.

The resolution, adopted unanimously Nov. 7, demands the Iraqis give up any chemical, biological or nuclear weapons, or face "serious consequences."

It requires Iraq to submit an accounting by Dec. 8 of its weapons programs, as well as of chemical, biological and nuclear programs it claims are peaceful. Any "false statements or omissions" in that declaration could contribute to a finding it had committed a "material breach" of the resolution – a finding that might lead to military action.

The Bush administration has threatened war to enforce Iraqi disarmament, with or without U.N. sanction. But other governments, including France, Russia and China, say that decision can be made only by the Security Council.

Sabri's letter, dated Saturday and released Sunday, complained that a key passage on providing documentation is unjust, "because it considers the giving of inaccurate statements – taking into consideration that there are thousands of pages to be presented in those statements – is a material breach."

Sabri wrote that the aim was clear: "to provide pretexts ... to be used in aggressive acts against Iraq."

After talks with the Iraqis last week, chief U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix said they had expressed "particular concern" about what was expected of them in reporting on their chemical industry, a complex area in which many toxic products can be

AN ONLOOKER WATCHES THE ACTION DURING A 3-ON-3 MATCH IN THE MASSPIRG HOOPS FOR HUNGER TOURNAMENT. THE TOURNAMENT RAISED $667 FOR AREA FOOD BANKS AND DREW 35 TEAMS INTO THE COMPETITION.

By Dan Lamothe

The 3-on-3 basketball Hoops for Hunger tournament hosted by the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) at Totman Gym drew 35 teams and raised nearly $700 for area food banks on Saturday.

"It was a good turnout," Mark Koch, a MassPIRG volunteer, said. "It was an all day event. Everyone in the tournament was just there to have fun. It was a really good atmosphere."

According to event co-organizer Janice Staab, the money raised with the tournament will go straight to area food banks, which can in turn buy nine dollars of food with each dollar that they receive in donations. With the $667 raised, food banks will be able to purchase $6003 worth of food for the hungry.

Koch said a $20 entrance fee for the tournament went straight to charity.

"We also collected canned goods and things like that," Staab said.

"They had a little prep talk before they started," student participant Sang Nguyen said. "They explained what its for and that all the money was going to charity."

Nguyen said that the tournament was "very competitive."

"Overall, it was a lot of fun," Nguyen said.

Staab, a freshman, said that she organized the tournament with three other interns working at MassPIRG this semester, including Katie Miller, Diana Korasadowicz and Mary Jane Ela.

"It went pretty smooth. This is our first involvement in it," Staab said.

Eric Carle Museum opens

By Bonnie Obremski
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Eric Carle Museum of Picture Book Art at Hampshire College hosted its grand opening Friday with a ribbon cutting ceremony.

Nora Maroulis, director of development and marketing for the museum, took the hand of a nearby child at the ceremony and brought her over to the large red ribbon that dropped across the entrance to the museum. There, with the help of Carle himself, the banner was sliced and the museum was declared open to the public.

"This museum," Director Nicholas Clark said, "cares about not how smart you are, but how you are smart."

In other words, visitors of the Picture Book Art museum need not be well versed in the works of Renaissance painters. The museum focuses on the experience of being surrounded by the primary colored characters of one's childhood.

"Museums have been around for a long time," said children's book author Carle, who created the The Hungry Caterpillar. "They began with one person showing something beautiful to another person."

A group of children from the Willie Ross School for the Deaf in Longmeadow, Mass. presented the author with a collage in the form of homemade greeting cards. The student's instructors, Betsy Grenier and Irene Larussa, have been reading the works of Carle to the class every week since September.

"The [art] studio can, in some respects, be seen as the heart of the museum," said Greg Prince, president of Hampshire College.

The area gives children the opportunity to create masterpieces of their own after having viewed the works of various picture book artists in the galleries.

Prince's stepmother, Cynthia Prince, initiated the Eric Carle museum project over 10 years ago by encouraging Carle and his wife Bobbie to follow through on their dream.

"[Carle] is a creative genius," Prince said. "[This museum] is an experience you would die for."

Friday's visitors came from far and wide to attend the opening. The National Art Honor Society sent up a busload of students from Piedmont High School in Charlotte, N.C. New York resident Karen McCartney piled her four children in the car at 7:30 a.m. to make the 10:30 a.m. ribbon cutting ceremony.

"I read that Eric Carle...wanted to give back to the community," said McCartney on why she chose to visit the museum. "He just seemed so humble."

"Stories of childhood make an indelible impression upon all of us," Clark said. "We hope that this museum will make an indelible impression."

The Eric Carle Museum of Picture Book Art, Museum Shop and Museum Cafe, will be open Tuesday through Saturday from 10a.m. to 4 p.m. and Sunday from noon to 4 p.m. Student admission is $2 with valid ID, $4 for adults and $3 for seniors. Children under 12 months of age are free and family charges are capped at $10.

Answers on Saudi money sought

By Calvin Woodward
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) — Lawmakers pressed for answers Sunday on a possible Saudi money trail in the Sept. 11 hijackings and said regardless of whether one exists, the kingdom must stop its "duplicitous" coddling of terrorists.

Saudi officials spent the weekend having bankers pore over the records of Princess Haifa al-Faisal, wife of their ambassador to the United States, to see how thousands of dollars from her account might have ended up in the wrong hands, said Saudi foreign policy adviser Adel al-Jubeir.

But he said it was "crazy" to suggest she had done anything intention ally to support terrorism.

Lawmakers said the FBI's investigation should pull no punches, and the Bush administration should be open about the findings, despite the risk of offending an important ally with whom relations already have been strained.

In a harsh turn hound to be uncomfortable for administration officials as they seek Saudi assistance in a possible war with Iraq, senators upbraided the Saudi government for what they see as years of complicity in anti-American radicalism.

Saudis "have played a duplicitous game, and that is, they say to the terrorists, 'We'll do everything you want, just leave us alone,'" said Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer of New York. "That game has got to stop."

Sens. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., and John McCain, R-Ariz., who together set up an independent commission that will investigate the terror attacks, offered piercing criticism.

Saudi leaders "have to decide which side they're on," Lieberman said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

"For too many generations they have pacified and accommodated themselves to the most extreme, fanatical, violent elements of Islam, and those elements have now turned on us and the rest of the world."

Added McCain: "The Saudi royal famih has been engaged in a Faustian bargain for years to keep themselves in power."

Still, none of the lawmakers knew whether the princess had meant for her money to go to Omar al Bayoumi and Osama Basnan. U.S. officials believe those men provided financial support to two of the Sept. 11, 2001, hijackers while the terrorists lived in the United States.

The foreign minister's letter disputed the allegations that his government retained chemical or biological weapons and rebuilt weapons programs. "The United States and Britain failed to give one credible proof on this matter," Sabri wrote.

Sabri also complained that the resolution gives the inspectors "unjust power" like "conducting interviews with citizens inside the country without the presence of a representative of their government or asking them to leave their country with their families for interviews or demanding lists of the names of all scientists and researchers and removing equipment without notifying the Iraqi government."

Sabri complained of what he called arbitrary powers being granted to inspectors, including "meeting people inside their country without the presence of a representative of their government, or asking them to leave the country with their families to meet (for interviews) abroad."

In notifying Annan of Iraq's acceptance of Resolution 1441, Sabri had advised the U.N. chief he would follow with this second letter commenting on supposed violations of international law and other problems with the resolution.

The Iraqi official urged that Security Council member nations ensure that the weapons inspectors are committed "to their obligations according to the U.N. charter and ... the United Nations' goals." If they do so, he wrote, they will "uncover the false U.S. accusations."

The U.N. experts' first missions are expected to be visits to Iraqi sites previously inspected in the 1990s, where they will check on cameras and other monitoring equipment left behind in many cases by earlier inspectors.

A top priority was establishing operational security at the U.N. offices, to maintain secrecy surrounding the targets of the inspectors' surprise visits.

"We are still testing our communications equipment to make sure we have secure lines," said Hiro Ueki, spokesman for the U.N. Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission, UNMOVIC.

The tournament was won by the trio of seniors Justin Zerneri and Matt Burstin and sophomore Chris Racine.

Koch said that the environment created by the players was loose, with participants calling their own fouls until the competition had been whittled down to the final eight teams.

Staab credited several organizations for helping out with the tournament, including the African, Latino, Asian/Pacific Islander & Native American (ALANA) diversity program, Students Helping Area Reachout Efforts (SHARE), BASIC, Alpha Phi Omega service fraternity and Delta Upsilon fraternity.

Staab said that the she and the same three interns involved in this event will run a Hunger Cleanup in the spring. A Hunger Cleanup is similar to a walk-a-thon. Students involved mobilize to gather canned food and nonperishable items.

PVTA bus involved in accident

An accident on Friday afternoon between two vehicles and a University of Massachusetts PVTA bus caused minor delays.

"I've never seen an accident right before my eyes," said Joanne Murphy, a fourth semester PVTA bus driver.

The accident happened at about 3:20 pm between the intersections of Clark Hill Road and Orchard Hill Drive. A Blue 35 Southbound Route campus shuttle was on its way down the hill and was waiting for a car on Orchard Hill Drive to turn left onto Clark Hill Road.

"I didn't even see the van, it just came flying up," Murphy said.

As the car was turning left onto Clark Hill Road a minivan was speeding up the hill. The car collided into the driver's side door of the minivan, which bounced off the car and into the bus. The bus was already at a complete stop.

Murphy said the majority of her passengers saw the accident about to happen and braced themselves for the impact.

"I was stopped right there and she just bumped into me."

Murphy said the van didn't hit the bus very hard and was probably traveling at between five and 10 miles per hour upon impact. The car had minimal damage to the front and the driver's side of the mini-van was crunched in.

"Nothing happened to me, there are just a few little marks on the bus," Murphy said.

The drivers of the car and mini-van were not injured. According to Murphy, the mini-van driver was taken away in an ambulance to be treated for an asthma reaction.

Murphy said navigating the intersection of Orchard Hill Drive and Clark Hill Road isn't tough for her because she knows the route well. She said she does see how it can be difficult for cars to make decisions about turning when there is a bus involved. According to Murphy, the situation on Friday is a common scenario at that intersection.

"It's not uncommon, but this time it's unfortunate I guess," Murphy said.

Catholic church:

Act more carefully

News of the priest confessions spread far and wide for months as damaging and damning information about the clergy in the Catholic Church was released. Even more prevalent were the statements that the church had mishandled the removal of priests from their parishes, bumping them from parish to parish but never removing them from their positions of power.

Now that the scandal has calmed a little, there are fewer stories regarding priests. Specifically, unless a reader was looking for it, he or she would not have been able to find a story covering Monsignor Michael Smith Foster's retreat to the Newton parish late last week in The Boston Globe.

Yes, his return to his parish is more than his removal.

Smith was reinstated from his parish in August when an altar boy accused him of sexual abuse. He was eventually reinstated when it was proven that the allegations were false.

While both his parishioners and himself advocated fiercely for his return, the church would not reinstate him until their investigation was over. Rather than operating in the same way that the American justice system does and assuming that someone is innocent until proven guilty, the church seems to have adopted the stance that all claims of abuse automatically mean guilty. While this may be effective in dealing with some guilty priests it can also result in the punishment of those who are entirely innocent.

Though this is a less significant story than the allegations of sex abuse themselves, it is still important. In the most basic way this is a testament to the way that the Catholic Church is handling these sex abuse claims. Because they were slow to deal with the claims in the first place, they seem now to be jumping the gun and immediately removing without the proper proof.

While child abuse is irreproachable, punishing someone simply for allegations and not on proof is equally terrible.

The church needs to begin to investigate claims of sexual abuse more seriously and more expediently. A priest who is innocent should not be removed from his position for more than five months, anymore than one who happens to be guilty be allowed to continue to sit around his ministry for years.

Because they are dealing with such a sensitive and serious subject, the Catholic Church needs to be more diligent about the way that they investigate and handle the sex abuse cases that have come to their attention.

Simply, the church needs to realize that claims of this type of gravity can and will affect lives forever.

There is no margin for error.

Lessons from a traveling granny

CAREY

I was reminded by the brief snowfall we had last week, which has now been completely absorbed into November's somber gray skies and freezing rain, that this time of year brings with it a change in people's behavior. For instance, the polite tap on the shoulder to get your friend's attention is replaced by hurling a snowball at their heads. And a number of lunch trays go missing from the DC only to reappear cracked and broken at the bottom of hills, considered to be good for sledding.

However, the greatest difference I see in people with the bi-polar seasonal change is that they become much more reclusive in the colder months. The sun shrinks away from the landscape, leaving it barren, cold and desolate. As New Englanders and college students, we do what comes natural, we hibernate. Spending more time locked in our rooms, we wake up in the afternoon, if we can, and savor the brief sunset of sunlight before we return to a world of frigid darkness. There is a rise in drinking during these times but a decrease in partying and celebration.

After I spent last Sunday watching the Patriots get embarrassingly spanked by the Oakland Raiders, I noticed that most of the Raiders fans weren't cold or freezing their butts off in a traditional New England blizzard. They not only seemed smug in their victory, but content with the climate in which they were celebrating it in. This vexed me more than watching our home team disappointingly drop another game.

At this point I was reminded of a Californian I had recently met one morning, a few hours before daylight in the lobby of a youth hostel in Montreal. She had traveled across the Continent to attend a three-day-long seminar on transvestites, a subject truly dear to her heart. When I first saw her enter the lobby, I knew by her light loquacious step, and warm approachable attitude that she was not from around here. Being the only other living soul in the room at the time, aside from the desk clerk, she immediately sat down and carried on a conversation with me. Far away from the sun and surf, this aged granny-like figure approached me as if the main purpose of her 5,000-mile journey was simply to meet new people. My own typical social reservation didn't stop her from sharing with me her lifetime of triumphs and tribulations. She came like an open book, chewing gum, twirling her gray hair and talking about her 20 years as a professor in the field of sexual education at some hyper-liberal west coast university. I was trying to type away on my laptop, but soon stopped and opened my ears to her in curiosity. She told me everything from the most recent sexual transgressions she had had with her ex-husband of 30 years to her daughter's current legal troubles.

The second night I was typing in the basement of the hostel hoping to avoid the distraction that had interrupted me the night before. However, my efforts were in vain. It was as if she had sought me out, and once again we began to chat. Her head was filled with stories of past travels and adventures. Our talk was generally small and I searched for wisdom from this person, who I felt had a lot to impart. She told me about her day: the 12 hours of video on transvestites she had seen, the male clerk at the desk, her search for some legendary bagel shop, and the struggles of communicating with her French roommates. She looked at a map of the city, and at 1:15 am this 80-year old woman planned her next move.

After she had decided, she slowly got up from the table we were sitting at and said, "I will probably never see you again, good luck in your travels." Afterwards, I realized that it was the only time she had used the future tense. Her whole ideology was about living in the moment, which was completely devoid of the concerns or grief over the future. Her actions and attitudes were free of the surroundings and situations she found herself in. For this simple reason the world is a brighter place for people like her. In our reclusive states we, especially as college students, tend to fret over the future too much. Letting these concerns fester in our minds can contort them and allow them to be blown out of proportion. The cold weather and miserable climate, for some of us, magnify these concerns by driving us indoors and away from others. In this way it's easy to lose context with reality, and with ourselves. God I hate winter.

The woman with the M-16

DAN YAGUDIN

Now with the [illegible]

I was [illegible] quoted to get into the restaurant. [illegible] late on a Thursday [illegible] work or school the following day. [illegible] ular restaurant was packed [illegible] known for its [illegible]

But despite all this [illegible] restaurant [illegible] [illegible] they were [illegible]

But first let me explain [illegible] thing. To get into [illegible] Israel, one almost always has to [illegible] be questioned by a multi-[illegible] and physically searched. [illegible] Palestinian suicide bombers [illegible] rather fatal attractive [illegible] search [illegible] long [illegible] You can guess my surprise [illegible] approached the head of the line, I found a guy standing. But you haven't even [illegible] enough?

And there she was. She was beautiful. About 5 foot 10, golden hair, bright green eyes, and an M-16. For those of you who are not familiar, an M-16 is a gun. A very big gun. Different people respond differently to armed and uniformed members of the opposite sex, but suffice to say I was intrigued. My intrigue was also due to the fact that the armed and uniformed woman was getting hit on by every single guy that she was searching as they entered the restaurant. The sight of her seemed to bring out a sense of deep concern for public safety in the Israeli male population and many protested that the woman with the M-16 didn't search them for long enough. After all, as one guy said, there are many different parts of the [illegible] where someone could hide bombs...

It's not hard to get a sense of Israel's security concerns. One gets a taste of it as soon as one lands at Ben Gurion airport. There, little old ladies with small white tags greet you and innocently start asking you questions. "Hi sweetie! Welcome to Israel. Who did you come here with? Your mom? Your dad? The Hamas? Al Qaeda?" One learns a few things rather quickly; for example, Israelis aren't kidding when they say never leave your bags unattended. Two summers ago, I was treated to a sight in an Israeli supermarket. We were out shopping when a police officer arrived. He calmly asked us to leave because he had to treat a suspicious object," a euphemism for a possible bomb. Next, he took out a robot with a sapper's rifle from his cruiser, and remote-controlled it towards a bag in the corner. In the last second a customer ran out of the bathroom shouting, "No, those are my bananas!" But it was too late. The robot fired, and the result was a rather spectacular banana split.

"Different people respond differently to armed and uniformed members of the opposite sex, but suffice to say I was intrigued."

Israelis owe a debt of gratitude to people like the woman with the M-16. The comparatively low number of Israeli casualties in the latest violence certainly isn't due to a lack of trying on the Palestinian terrorists' part. Israelis are incredibly security-conscious. Israeli bus drivers have pushed suicide bombers off their busses, policemen have stopped them with their bodies (and paid for this action with their lives,) and the likes of the woman with the M-16 make it extremely difficult to execute attacks inside of Israel. As one unsuccessful pickup line to the woman from that night put it: "You make it hard to be a terrorist." To this she responded with a nudge on the trigger, and the perpetrator of the failed pickup line ran inside.

As humorous as this whole encounter was to watch, it underlines a rather grim reality. Israelis live under constant fear of terrorism. In Israel, whenever we hear a siren, we listen to how many sirens follow it. If it's just one, then we breathe a sigh of relief and hope for the recovery of whomever is inside the ambulance. If two or three follow, it might still be a car accident. If four, five, six or more follow, we turn on the television to find out where the latest suicide bombing occurred.

Nice as it is to have armed women in security guard uniforms, I would much rather forgo this pleasure for a state of peace where I don't have to count ambulance sirens. I therefore call on Arafat and the Palestinian Authority to stop the violence they instigated, violence that is hurting Palestinians and Israelis alike.

Maybe when Arafat's murderous Intifada is over, there won't be a need for the likes of the woman with the M-16.

Letter to the Editor:

To the Editor:

SPIRE, the new Student Information System, began registering students on Thursday, Nov. 14. At the end of the first week, 6101 undergraduates registered into approximately 31,285 course seats. This corresponds to about 75 percent of those undergraduates who were eligible to use the system in the first week (mostly seniors and juniors). A smaller percentage of graduate students also used the system.

System response times have generally been good, though at peak usage periods some response times have been unacceptable (the target is for all response times to be under two seconds; response times greater than five-10 seconds are considered unacceptable). Response times on the enrollment pages have been very good with less than one percent falling into the unacceptable range. The class search response times have not been as good, with up to 30 percent of the response times falling into the unacceptable range during periods of peak usage. In the first week, there were 261,602 online class searches executed; at peak times these were running in excess of 100 per minute. We have been making adjustments throughout the week to improve the class search response; it appears that these have been successful in significantly reducing, though not yet totally eliminating, the frequency of unacceptable response times.

As we proceed into the second week of online registration, we will continue to try to improve response times and to remedy "bugs" as they are identified. Should you encounter difficulties, it is important that you report them to the OIT Help Desk (545-9400) or through the survey. We do have to be cautious in making changes at this point, however, since untested changes can result in degradation of the system, as happened a couple of times this past week. We will compile all issues and attempt to resolve them for next semester's registration period.

For anyone who has used SPIRE, whether that experience was good or bad, please consider filling out the online survey located at www.housing.umass.edu/spire_survey. The survey is also available at the SPIRE logon page. Those surveys will be used to inform changes in next semester's system. Prizes will be awarded to randomly selected students who fill out the survey.

Simplicity reins in Mayer's Mullins Center debut

Raved tunes, stage setting and costuming hit the spot

JOHN MAYER REVEALS ON-STAGE STRONG PASSION ABOUT HIS MUSIC AND ITS PRESENTATION.

By Lizzy Nielsen
COLLEGIAN STAFF

JOHN MAYER
Mullins Center
Nov. 23

"Good evening, I'm John."

Truly a statement of the obvious, but somehow the simplicity of the proclamation captured the essence of the atmosphere Saturday night at the Mullins Center.

John Mayer took the stage with his guitar and a single spotlight and opened with "Love Soon," a number from his first album Inside Wants Out.

After a solid hour from opening band Nickelcreek, the crowd started to express restlessness. Nickelcreek, although very impressive musically, isn't quite up to arena performance par, and probably would have been better suited for an Iron Horse or Pearl Street type performance. There were a few bright moments in Nickelcreek's set, including sampling from Nirvana, The Beatles and possibly the most popular cover of the evening, the theme to Super Mario Brothers.

Mayer went on to completely blow away the viewer with the complex simplicity of his show. That may seem like a complete oxymoron, but Mayer possesses incredible musicianship, and the complexity of his guitar solos and the time changes he's able to direct his band through is reminiscent of a modern day big band, ala Duke Ellington or Count Basie. The simplicity aspect comes from the black background, Mayer dressed in a T-shirt and dark pants and the lack of any kind of glitz or glamour to the show in general.

Much of Mayer's nearly two hour set included songs from his second and more popular album, Room for Squires, but certain commercially unreleased tracks and numbers from his first album, Inside Wants Out. Included in his performance was "83," which to the crowds amusement sampled Cyndi Lauper's "Girls Just Wanna Have Fun," and another catchy 80s number "Let's Hear it for the Boy," from one-hit wonder Denise Williams.

Mayer was also given the opportunity to woo the audience with his evident sense of humor. Mayer proclaimed, "I [expletive] love porn," and expressed American children's need to discover porn the old fashioned way – through finding a dirty, beat-up copy of Hustler in the woods behind their middle school. Mayer then encouraged the audience to go out, purchase a porno magazine, run it under some water and ditch it in the woods somewhere. After this amusing speech, Mayer and his band launched into current top 40 hit "Your Body is a Wonderland."

Mayer's honesty and ability to relate to his audience is unparalleled. Before launching into "Back to You," Mayer told the audience, "This is a song about second chances, and third chances, and fourth chances and fifth and sixth and seventh and eighth chances. When your friends don't understand why you keep going back to this person but you do." Any person of the 20-something age would be hard pressed to say they've never felt that.

That seems to be the sentiment among all of Mayer's songs, as they are reflective of emotions adults in their 20s feel. Mayer fans are interesting, as they know the words to every single song on his album, along with many others. Songs that haven't been released on commercial radio became 8,000-person sing-a-longs on Saturday evening.

"MAYER'S AND ABILITY TO RELATE TO HIS AUDIENCE IS ..."

The encore had to be the most breathtaking moment of the evening was without a doubt the encore. Mayer played a solo acoustic version of his female-favorite number, "Comfortable," as well as the seemingly holiday appropriate "St. Patrick's Day." Mayer encouraged the audience to go out and find someone special to spend the holidays with, as it makes the season so much more enjoyable.

Mayer is a gent in the bedrock of pop music today. It's obvious to anyone who's seen one of his shows that he's unbelievably passionate about what he does. From his lemon-sucking expressions during his guitar solos to the way his body sways when he plays to the passion that encompasses his hijinks singing, Mayer loves what he does, and he performs it in the most raw and unrehearsed form possible. That in itself, is special in a world of stage shows ruled by choreographed dance moves and pyrotechnics.

On top of his on-stage genuineness, Mayer is truly appreciative of his fans. After the show, approximately 50 people waited outside the backdoor of the Mullins Center to get a glimpse of Mayer walking to his bus, but to the amazement of all the freezing souls outside, Mayer came over and greeted the crowd and signed autographs for everyone who stood outside waiting for him, remarking about the frigid weather and how he'd be inside right now if he were among the group.

The simplicity of Mayer's performance and the complexity of his music, and just the passion he possesses for what he does made the evening spectacular. John Mayer's live concert is truly the epitome of what a musical experience should be.

The King of Rock 'n Roll still headin' all the music charts

Elvis 30 No. 1 Hits pleases fans in offering many - though not all - Elvis hits

By Melissa Hammel
COLLEGIAN STAFF

ELVIS PRESLEY
Elvis 30 No. 1 Hits
RCA

It is a little like nostalgia.

That is the only way to describe the feeling you get when music is so familiar it feels like it has always been a part of your life. However in dealing with Elvis 30 No. 1 Hits, it honestly is music that has accompanied listeners for over 30 years.

This collaboration of hits can hardly be called a new album – but more a new project from the likes of RCA to creatively rejuvenate the posthumous career of Elvis Presley. What would seem like a pathetic effort to drag out a couple more dollars out of a dead icon is a tactic that more than flies with a celebrity of the likes of Elvis.

Forget about the leather pants, the confident sneer or the hip swivel that made him so famous; all pop cultural references aside, this album proves once and for all that no matter how many years pass, the music still survives untainted.

The conception of the album itself was pretty simple; RCA gathered up 30 songs that had hit the number one spot at any time in Elvis's career along with a remixed bonus track, "a little conversation." The hits spanned from early to late career and included a mixture of ballads, the upbeat Elvis hits and even the more serious material of his later career.

The only fault a listener could find with this composition is not in the music but much more in the composition of the album. The CD rolls through the hits in chronological order rather than organizing it by subject matter or type.

Elvis Presley himself was known for the methodical way he went about setting up his recording sessions and organizing the arrangement of his albums. It doesn't seem to do much justice to arrange a greatest hits album for a man obsessed with presentation in everything from his live shows to his musical and film work, without giving consideration to how the order of the music will affect the listener. That aside, it is interesting to see the different stages of his career portrayed in the form of a greatest hits CD.

The album leads off on an upswing with the 1956 hit "Heartbreak Hotel," the first single from RCA and a song based on a suicide note printed in the Miami Herald. The upbeat hit melds well into his July hits of 1956 including the well recognizable "Don't Be Cruel" and "Hound Dog," which reached popularity following a number of live performances. Also representing the period of his early popularity include ballads such as "Love Me Tender," one of the only hits he wrote himself and song he danced to at his wedding to wife Pricilla.

There are also a number of hits representing the middle of Elvis's life, most of which catapulted to number one with the help of his ongoing movie career. While a number of his films were hardly considered masterpieces, the music from them has had staying power for years following. Some of these include arguably the best ballad of Elvis's career "Can't Help Falling in Love" from Blue Hawaii, "Return to Sender," which was written previous to the film Girls, Girls, Girls but was included because of its popularity and earlier hits such as the heart pounding "Jailhouse Rock" from the movie of the same title and the teasing hit, "Hardheaded Woman" of King Creole popularity.

Perhaps the best section of the album comes at the end of the CD with the inclusion of late Elvis hits like the angst ridden, "Suspicious Minds" and the painful emotion filled rendition of "In the Ghetto." Two of Elvis's most serious songs, both reflect a period of post-divorce depressed Elvis and the issues of his personal life more than reflected themselves into the life of his songs.

The album closes with a remixed version of "A Little Less Conversation," supplied as a selling gimmick from RCA. While it is always nice to provide new material when you can, there is no foreseeable reason to remix a perfectly good Elvis song beyond the purpose of selling albums. The remix is fine; it is well done; but it is difficult to justify why it should be included beyond the purpose of selling albums.

Overall, the music is wonderful, Elvis Presley comes across as the vibrant and multi-talented performer that he clearly is, even generations later. The only problems lie solely with the format. The seeming hastily put together composition and inclusion of the remix doesn't do justice to the career of a complex and talented individual.

If you are an Elvis fan or simply want a good dose of some terrific songs, go out and buy the album. However, if you are expecting perfection, you are not going to get it.

LATEST ALBUM FEATURING ELVIS PRESLEY MUSIC GATHERS SOME, THOUGH NOT ALL, OF THE KING'S HITS ON ONE DISK.

Theatre Guild entertaining with Pippin

By Jake D. Lewis
COLLEGIAN STAFF

PIPPIN
Bowker Auditorium
Nov. 22

Pippin is certainly a more mature and logical show to perform on a college campus than the Theatre Guild's recent production of the childish Once Upon A Mattress; after all, Pippin is all about sex, rebellion and utter contentment - subjects most every young adult struggles with.

What nags at me, though, is that there are so many more (dare I say better?) musicals out there dealing with these conflicts too, and the Guild's decision to go with yet another stock show, than high schools and drama groups perform ad nauseum defeats the purpose of college theatre. There's very little pushing of the envelope or even interesting new takes on the old tale, and while Pippin was, overall, one of the Guild's superior productions of late, it doesn't do anything more than entertain. As opposed to the original staging of Pippin, which packed a wallop with its thought-provoking content and dazzling musical score (by master Stephen Schwartz), it has unfortunately fallen into the grasping of shows that should ultimately be retired from any theatre-group's repertoire, having been there and done that too often before.

The Leading Player (Andre Hall) weaves the story of Pippin – the son of Charles the Great who returns home from school but can't seem to find his place in the world where he'll truly be happy. Does he want power or the simple things in life? Through a series of scenes and musical numbers, The Leading Player and his magic-makers lead Pippin on a journey of self-discovery, all building up to the Grand Finale – the moment where Pippin must ultimately decide how he wants to be remembered.

Playing the title character is sophomore Mike Devlin, who perfectly embodies the role of a confused, yet likeable young man. He adds just the right amount of innocence and intelligence to Pippin, the son of Charles the Great, while capturing all of the passion of Schwartz's music with his stunning voice, right from the first bars of "Corner of the Sky." Devlin is utterly comfortable to watch and dominates the stage whenever he's on, but also allows for other people to shine in the spotlight too.

Among them is Jackie Hebert, playing the role of Pippin's classy grandmother Berthe, who unarguably has the best role in the show. Despite only being onstage for one scene, she blew the roof off of the Bowker Auditorium with her song "No Time At All." At times, though, Hebert seemed to struggle to keep up the energy of the rousing song, and the choreography seemed a little clunky, but it was nonetheless the one big show-stopper. And while the role of Pippin's lover, Catherine (Carolyn Ritter), is often an unmemorable and glossed-over part, Ritter brings an extremely endearing quality to it not soon forgotten.

It would be unfair to forget Andre Hall as The Leading Player, the ringleader of the magical tour. Just as before, Hall nearly transforms himself for the role, and that's part of the show's biggest treat; while watching him dance up a storm that would make Bob Fosse proud, it is hard to believe this is the same guy who played the part of the blood-hungry Wolf last year in the Guild's production of Into the Woods. Part of the immense appeal of Hall's performances is, instead of being big and over-the-top, he captures the audience with the little things he manages to fit into the part he is playing. Hall's performance is simply jaw-dropping (once again), and if there were Tony Awards for the Guild, he would rightly deserve one.

Pam DeGregorio's costumes are terrific, conveying the idea of oneness and blending in to the world around you, while the bare-bones stage is wonderfully fitting. The lighting design, too, worked well, despite the few technical glitches that occurred throughout the performance. Director Jill Coleman has staged a sturdy production of Pippin (even though the ensemble leaves a little to be desired in the area of enthusiasm), yet it's unfortunate she couldn't apply her talent to more daring and uncommon material. To her credit, the very end of the show, which has to deal with Catherine's son Theo, is a superb touch unseen performed before in the many productions of Pippin I have witnessed. While it is slightly clichéd and unfounded, it contentedly brings the story full circle.

Pippin may not have been an inventive or audacious show for the Guild to do, but at the very least, it does entertain. The Guild should now take some advice preached by the show itself: do a little growing up, find something truly extraordinary and make your mark a lasting one.

Chamber Choral's diverse music fills Bowker Sunday

Bowker Auditorium was filled Sunday night with music performed in Latin, German, Spanish and English. Director Dr. L. Wayne Abercrombie opened the show: "We were trying to cover a lot of different music from a lot of different places and a lot of different times," he announced. With songs ranging from "Selig sind die Toten," written by Heinrich Shutz in the early 1600s, to Emily Dickinson's, "Musicians Wrestle Everywhere," put to music by Elliot Carter in 1908; it is safe to say Dr. Abercrombie accomplished his agenda.

"There is something magical about doing this," Junior Alto singer Kirsten Neale expressed summing the night's ambience. "There is just something that pops once the show starts."

The good of the performance flickered from a serious feeling of sorrow with numbers like Dickinson's "Heart Not So Heavy as Mine," elated rapture shown in Schutz's "Selig sind die Toten" and everywhere in between.

The Chamber Choral showed a great ability to perform in more than just the typical choir style. They sung two quartets of Johannes Brahms' works and also broke into a little acapella for "Las Flores que me diste," a Venezuelan Folk song. Bass singer Brendan Buckley commented, "It was a lot of work doing a show as eclectic as this, but once it got going it all came together."

Paul Halley's, "Agnus Dei," was brought to life by the choral accompanied by the soprano saxophone of Lynn Kinck, and the show came to a close with a gospel style song entitled, Walk in Jerusalem, created by Paul Bardin in 1965. Abercrombie invited the entire crowd to, "Tap your feet. Clap your hands. Hum or sing along, if you want. Get up and dance; if you feel like it. Do whatever the music moves you to do," to the piece, punctuated with a cool, jazzy sounding solo performed by Senior Joshua Sprague.

A variety of sound, strong instrumental compliments and a dramatic director decked out in theater tails complete with a sense of humor, this show had only one weak point: it was only an hour long.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22- Dec. 21)- Today is not the day to expand your horizons and try a variety of new things. Spending time around people and places that are familiar to you might be the safest bet.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19)- You have been under a great deal of undue stress recently. Take stock of your life and let the small things go.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20- Feb. 18)- There is going to be some serious upheaval in your love life this coming week. While it might seem difficult right now, sitting down and talking about it is the best solution in the long run.

PISCES (Feb. 19- March 20) Today you are going to need to keep reminding yourself that a break is right around the corner. While you are swamped with work now the end is in sight.

ARIES (March 21- April 19) – Take time to smell the roses today and appreciate the good aspects of your life.

TAURUS (April 20- May 20) – You are going to need to support a good friend that is going through a difficult time. This should come as second nature to you but remember to set aside some time for yourself.

GEMINI (May 21- June 20)- Don't slack off today. Even though it seems like it may not be necessary, go the extra mile. It will help you out in the long run.

CANCER (June 21- July 22)- You are in for a couple of big surprises today, things aren't always what they seem. Don't worry, it will all work out for the best.

LEO (July 23- Aug. 22)- You can spend today coasting by because for the first time this month you are on easy street. Appreciate it while it lasts because it is going to be short lived.

VIRGO (Aug. 23- Sept. 22)- Call a friend that you haven't spoken to in a long time. Today someone will really need to hear from you.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 21)- Start thinking about all of those things that you have been putting off all week. While procrastination may make you feel better now, you will be cursing yourself later.

SCORPIO (Oct. 22- Nov. 21)- You will be coming into a lot of money in the next few days, spend it wisely otherwise you might have problems.

Minutemen say aloha to IU in opener

Anderson looks to lead UMass past national runner-up Indiana in Maui

By Matthew F. Sacco
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Some are envious of Anthony Anderson.

"Everybody keeps sayin' 'I wish I was you, put me in your suitcase,'" Anderson said through a chuckle.

People glutton at his rising status as an elite college point guard, his free trip to Maui and subsequent national television appearance.

But of all the perks they mention, nobody has claimed a desire to go nose to nose with Tom Coverdale – the All-American point guard from national runner-up Indiana.

No, it seems the only one looking forward to that match-up is Anderson.

"He's one of the best guards in the country," Anderson said, scratching his chin in anticipation.

It took a season, but with each passing scene in Act II of Anderson's career in Amherst, it becomes clearer that this is his team now.

While co-captain Micah Brand waxes on about the thrill of playing a storied program such as Indiana, Anderson concedes no such advantage.

"It's like a couple years ago when we played North Carolina," Brand said. "As a kid you always dream about playing against a team like this."

Anderson hangs his head below the microphone during his captain's speech. He's almost zoning out, focusing on the upcoming match-up.

He had better focus.

Because if the Minutemen are going to pull off the mother of all upsets in the first round of the Maui Invitational tonight, Anderson is going to be the one that leads them there.

And to lead, Anderson is going to have to shoot the ball.

Following an exhibition win over Team Nike, in which Anderson attempted just three shots but was given the opportunity to take more, UMass coach Steve Lappas laid it on the line.

"Those plays were designed for Anthony Anderson to shoot the ball," he said. With the reigning Atlantic 10 rookie of the year timid on the trigger, the Minutemen looked very vulnerable in a 12-point win.

The next time, with a threat to his playing time tied to his shot attempts, Anderson let fly, hitting 5-7 shots for 17 points in a 30 point win.

"The quote was 'If you don't shoot the ball, I'm going to kill you,'" Lappas said, referring to a practice earlier in the week.

It's no coincidence that when Anderson is the focus of the offense, the Minutemen run a much smoother game. The same will have to hold true against Indiana this evening.

If Anderson again chooses to be gun-shy, Coverdale won't have to work much on defense, making him more dangerous in transition. Then Lappas might just think about following through on that threat.

Minutewomen bury SHU in Dacko debut

By Andrew Merritt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

At long last, the Marnie Dacko era at UMass began Friday night, and her high-paced, big offense system is already producing results.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team ran over Sacred Heart by the score of 74-48, led by sophomore Katie Nelson, one of four players who scored in double-figures.

SHU	48

Nelson's 15 points on the night were a game high. Seniors Nekole Smith (14), Jennifer Butler (13) and Ebony Pegues (13) joined Nelson on top of the score sheet.

The 26-point margin was the highest for a UMass opening night victory since Nov. 29, 1978, an 86-49 win over Harvard.

It was also an improvement over last year's season opener, when the Minutewomen were beaten handily by Holy Cross, 68-42.

"I think this is a real accomplishment for us," Butler said. "We have a pretty tough schedule, and this is the first game in a line of games that we have to win. It lifts our spirits a little bit."

Leading the way for Sacred Heart was freshman Nicolle Rubino, who notched 15 points, knocking down four shots from beyond the arc. The only other Pioneer to score in double figures was senior Brooke Kelly, who had 14 points and six rebounds.

The Minutewomen started the game off on an 8-0 run, holding the Pioneers scoreless for the first 6:19. After a Kelly layup broke the shutout, the Minutewomen answered with the first of Nelson's four three-pointers in the game. The only sign of life shown by the Pioneers in the first half was an outburst by Rubino, who splashed two treys in a 40-second span. The first half ended with UMass up 40-24.

The second frame was more of the same, and Sacred Heart would get no closer to evening the score. The Minutewomen pulled away with 34 second-half points.

Though UMass saw some inspired play from the likes of Pegues, who went six-for-11 from the field, it was hampered by poor foul shooting and a plethora of missed layups. The Minutewomen shot just 46.2 percent from the line.

They made up for it with a well-conducted fast break that led to 15 of their 74 points on the night. The Maroon and White also shone in the paint, where it scored 45 points.

With the game well in hand, Dacko was also able to get every player on the bench into the game including seniors Kristin Cannon and Stasia Robinson, who had no minutes during the entire 2001-02 season.

"For everyone on our bench to play, to empty our bench, we've really done our jobs as starters," Pegues said. "They do their job everyday in practice, so it's our job to make sure that we get out there and handle business so they have the opportunity to come in and establish themselves."

With her 13 points, Butler moved into a tie with Beth Wilbor for 12th on the UMass all-time career scorers list at 1,014. The Brooklyn, N.Y. native also grabbed a game-high 13 rebounds, including nine defensive boards.

Dacko was all smiles after the game, with her first official contest as head coach of the Minutewomen under her belt. She joins six of her predecessors in winning her first game at the helm of the Maroon and White. Still, the coach had some criticism for her charges.

"I have to say I am critical, because of my expectation for this team," Dacko said. "My goal was to keep the turnovers under 15, and we had 21, and it's all mental mistakes. I am going to be tough on them. I just think we have a lot of work to do. We're not in the best shape right now, and they know that."

UMass is back in action tonight, when they travel to Jersey City, N.J. for a matchup with the St. Peter's Peahens.

Katie Nelson scored 15 points and shot 4-5 from 3-point range.

Police unveil new security initiatives

Potential substation highlights list of new security measures

By Dan Lamothe
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A potential police substation in the Southwest Residential Area highlights changes that the University of Massachusetts is planning on implementing to improve safety and security on campus for next semester.

Barbara O'Connor, chief of the University of Massachusetts Police Department (UMPD), said that the substation will give police greater visibility in Southwest, the largest residential area on campus.

"The substation will hopefully facilitate a partnership with students to create a safe environment," O'Connor said.

Other initiatives planned for the spring semester at UMass include a community policing and problem solving program, a police cadet program and a canine safety program.

"Campus safety is one of my major priorities," said JoAnne Vanin, interim vice chancellor for student affairs and campus life. "These initiatives have the full support of Chancellor John Lombardi, and have been developed through close collaboration with Police Chief Barbara O'Connor and the Chancellor's Committee on Campus Safety.

"We believe these proactive steps will help will to move the campus in a new direction to enhance the safety of all members of the UMass Amherst community," she said.

"Similar programs have proven successful on other university campuses," O'Connor said. "I have every expectation that these initiatives will be effective deterrents to incidents on our campus as well."

According to O'Connor, the police substation was originally planned to be put in the Hampden Dining Hall, but may not be anymore.

"The dream is to have a joint police/health service center in Southwest, but the cost of renovating the space [in Hampden] has come in high," she said. "We're reevaluating and looking for alternatives."

O'Connor said that they are still looking to put the substation in place for next semester.

"I'm going to continue to pursue it," she said.

"We don't need a whole lot of space," she said. "We were hoping to have a space large enough to house both the substation and student security."

Another initiative to be implemented for the spring semester is a canine safety patrol. According to O'Connor, UMPD has obtained a trained police dog. The dog, a mixed-breed purchased at the New England Canine Academy in East Hartford, Conn., is named Max and will be used for suspect tracking.

"Max is a friendly pooch…he's a nice dog. We have yet to select a handler for him," O'Connor said.

O'Connor said that the handler of the dog will be a UMass police officer, and that once selected, the officer and Max will undergo a ten-week training program before becoming certified for patrol duties. At this point Max will become an official part of the department and will be cared for by the officer working with him and housed at his or her home.

"The use of canines is a growing trend in public safety on college campuses," O'Connor said. "In addition to aiding in the investigation of crimes, they have also been shown to be an effective tool in crime prevention."

The community policing and problem-solving program is a possibility in part now that UMPD is back to full staffing, with 42 officers and a complete commanding staff. O'Connor said that she will be able to assign as many as five officers to a 7 p.m. to 3 a.m. shift policing the residential areas.

"For us, it's the first time in a long time [that we're back to full staffing]," O'Connor said. "I'll have five officers conceivably working an additional shift that we've never had before. You can arrange your shifts around your peak periods [of police activity]."

"We never had enough staff, we always had four or five openings," O'Connor said. "That's a huge hole…we called it the revolving door."

The gradual increase in the number of officers as they have been trained this semester has allowed UMPD with additional flexibility that they did not have last year, allowing them to reach out to the UMass community with additional programs, such as with rape aggression defense training.

"We used to only be able to do one [rape defense program], this time we were able to do six," O'Connor said. "That's probably the best example of one of the things that we were immediately able to do this semester."

In all, about 10 officers have been hired in the past year.

"We currently provide training for resident assistants and educational and safety awareness programs in the residence halls," O'Connor said. "But now, instead of simply responding to calls, we can identify problems and work more effectively with residence staff to solve them."

The community policing effort will be aided by the creation of a police cadet program. The program is designed to recruit college students who are interested in a career in law enforcement and provide them with paid, on-the-job experience.

O'Connor said that the cadets will be sworn as police officers and will have police powers. They will be trained according to standards established by the state. Ten cadets will be hired initially in time for the start of next semester.

"The cadets will be learning the police profession while working to enhance campus safety," O'Connor said.

"At the same time, they'll be able to achieve their educational goals. Providing this kind of opportunity is an integral part of the University's mission.

A proposed police substation may be put into the Hampden Dining Hall next semester. This is one of several security initiatives that the University will implement for the spring.

A storage room like this one in Hampden Dining Common is a likely candidate for the home of a new police substation in the Southwest residential area.

One out of three professors rehired

Associated Press

AMHERST, Mass. (AP) – One out of every three University of Massachusetts professors who took early retirement this summer is back working on the Amherst campus on a part-time basis just so the university has enough teachers to cover classes.

And one of every five other campus employees who took advantage of the retirement program aimed at easing the state's money troubles was also rehired to keep computer and other operations going, officials said.

"It's a stop gap," said Leon Osterweil, dean of the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics, which lost 30 faculty members to early retirement and rehired eight part-time.

The college replaced 12 retiring professors with new full-time faculty members and made "a huge number of temporary appointments," both full and part-time to cover other classes, Osterweil said Monday.

Joyce Hatch, interim vice chancellor for administration and finance, said the early retirements helped cover a $10.2 million cut in the state appropriation of $223 million for the Amherst campus, but she could not be specific about savings.

"It's complicated," she said, pointing out that pensions come out of the state's general fund and not the university's operating budget and individual campus departments make staffing decisions out of their own operating budget.

However, Chancellor John Lombardi has said he plans to spend between $5 million and $4 million to replace the open faculty positions and another $2 million to fill support staff positions.

"We don't have the kind of money to put them all back," Lombardi told the Faculty Senate at a recent meeting. "But chunk by chunk we hope within three years to be back at full strength."

Currently 35 of the 109 faculty members who took early retirement are back teaching at least one class, most at a rate based on their prior salary, officials said.

Under state pension laws, their hours are limited and their total public pension and post-retirement pay cannot exceed their salary before retirement.

Homeland Security Act signed

By Ron Fournier
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – President Bush on Monday named close friend Tom Ridge to head the new Department of Homeland Security, but said even the biggest government shakeup in more than a half-century can "neither predict nor prevent every conceivable attack."

"We're doing everything we can to protect America," Bush said as he signed a bill creating the department. "In a free and open society, no department of government can completely guarantee our safety against ruthless killers who move and plot in shadows."

With that sobering assessment from an East Room stage, Bush asked the Senate to confirm his nomination of Ridge and named two high-powered deputies: Navy Secretary Gordon England and Drug Enforcement Administration Director Asa Hutchinson.

A large portion of the department will take shape March 1, when the Secret Service, Immigration and Naturalization Service and a few other agencies transfer their employees and budgets to the new entity, officials said. The final pieces will be put in place Sept. 30, 2003 – more than two years after the attacks that prompted the overhaul.

The officials spoke on condition of anonymity.

Ridge, 57, is a Vietnam hero, a former congressman and longtime political ally of the Bush family who nearly 14 months ago left his position as Pennsylvania governor to serve in the White House. No one else was seriously considered for the job, Bush aides said.

As the president's homeland security adviser, Ridge has won praise for improving communication between Washington and local governments. His most visible creation – the color-coded national warning system – became an instant butt of jokes but has helped Americans understand the ebbs and flows in terrorism threats, even if they're still unsure what, if anything, to do about the dangers.

Bush initially opposed creation of a homeland security department. But, facing criticism from Democrats, he embraced the concept in June and used it as a political issue in the midterm election campaign.

"The continuing threat of terrorism, the threat of mass murder on our own soil, will be met with a unified, effective response," Bush told an overflow White House crowd.

He has given Ridge a daunting assignment to combine nearly two dozen agencies, $40 billion in budgets and 170,000 employees spread across a broad swath of federal bureaucracy and well-protected turf.

It is the biggest federal reorganization since the Defense Department's birth in 1947, and critics warn that problems are sure to crop up.

White House press secretary Ari Fleischer said it will take more than a year to get the agency fully up and running. But the administration's transition plan, devised in secret meetings near the White House for months, sets a more ambitious goal of Sept. 30, 2003, officials said.

Agencies can begin moving to the new department 90 days after the plan is submitted to Congress. Bush plans to submit it almost immediately.

The first wave of agencies folding into the department March 1 include the Secret Service, Coast Guard, Customs Service, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Transportation Safety Administration and the General Service Administration's federal protective services, officials said.

The changes will continue in phases.

The FBI loses its National Infrastructure Protection Center on April 1. The Pentagon's national communication system moves to the new department May 1. The Agriculture Department's Plum Island Animal Disease Center shifts June 1.

"I think it's doable, but I wouldn't expect all the warts to be worked out in the first year," said Dwight Ink, a former Office of Management and Budget and General Services official.

The department will soon open temporary headquarters in the Washington area. Its long-term housing will be determined later.

Ridge, who had close ties to the first Bush White House, was on the president's short list of potential running mates in 2000, but his abortion-rights views made his nomination untenable to conservatives.

Another example of his centrist views – a record of accommodating unions – may help Ridge heal a rift between the White House and labor groups representing federal employees. They oppose a provision in the bill that allows the waiv-

U.N. tells Iraq it must provide evidence

U.N. WEAPONS INSPECTORS SIT IN A BUS AFTER ARRIVING AT SADDAM AIRPORT IN BAGHDAD YESTERDAY. THE FIRST TEAM OF U.N. INSPECTORS LANDED IN IRAQ YESTERDAY TO TAKE UP THE HUNT FOR CHEMICAL, BIOLOGICAL OR NUCLEAR ARMS PROGRAMS.

Chief inspector demands compliance on weapons

By Edith M. Lederer
ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

UNITED NATIONS (AP) – Chief U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix said Monday he warned Iraq that it must provide convincing evidence if it maintains – as it did last week – that it has no illegal weapons programs.

Iraqi officials said they intend to cooperate fully with U.N. inspectors who will resume work on Wednesday after nearly four years. Blix told the U.N. Security Council.

But on the critical issue of access, Iraqi officials remarked during talks last week in Baghdad "that the entry into a presidential site or a ministry was not exactly the same thing as entry into a factory," Blix said, according to his briefing notes.

The resolution allows inspectors to go anywhere at anytime, including presidential sites, and Blix said he stressed this point to the Iraqis and told them his teams would exercise this right. "We said we would inspect all sites on an equal basis," he told a news conference afterwards.

Blix said he would have 100 Inspectors on the ground by Christmas and that logistics were being rapidly strengthened. He also wants to open a field office in the northern city of Mosul "without delay."

"Thanks to assistance from the government of New Zealand we already have communications people and medics in place and before the end of the week, we may have the first of eight helicopters in Baghdad."

Blix told the council that the Iraqis had expressed "some uncertainty," about how it should prepare a declaration of all nuclear, chemical and biological programs.

Iraq is mandated to provide the council and inspectors with the declaration by Dec. 8.

Some of the Iraqi concerns appeared to be technical, including how detailed the submissions should be on Iraq's petrochemical industry.

"Clearly, the most important thing was that whatever there existed by way of weapons programs and proscribed items should be fully declared," Blix said he told the Iraqis.

"I added that four years had passed since the last inspections and that many governments believed that weapons of mass destruction programs remained in Iraq. The council had wanted to offer Iraq a last opportunity," he said.

"If the Iraqi side were to state – as it still did at our meeting – that there were no such programs, it would need to provide convincing documentary or other evidence," he told the council.

Blix said he urged Iraq to make a complete declaration and "to look into stores and stocks" to ensure that everything is reported on Dec. 8.

Retired English professor John Nelson, who had taught at the university since 1967 and founded its technical writing program, told the Union-News of Springfield that he came back to teach the core course "so the program doesn't die."

"The university stands in what could be a much more dangerous situation than in the 1980s," said retired math professor Edward Connors, warning that if the budget crisis continues, the university could find itself struggling to hold onto the young replacements for the retirees.

Connors, who is back teaching two courses after 14 members of the math department took early retirement, said in the last budget crisis the faculty's strength was in people in their 40s and early 50s.

"They had already won their Nobel Prizes and they made the decision to stay and tough it out," he said. "This time around the strength is in younger faculty and they are at a point in their careers when a move makes more sense."

Ronald Story, president of the faculty union, is concerned that with heavier workloads younger faculty will get fed up and leave while more of the older faculty will get fed up and retire.

Raised in blue-collar Erie, Pa., he worked summers as a union laborer and went to Harvard University.

He was elected to Congress in 1982 and served 12 years.

Homeland security act
a historical moment

President Bush signed the anticipated Homeland Security Act into law Monday.

With his pen stroke, Bush exacted the largest reorganization of departments within the federal government since 1947. According to CNN, Tom Ridge, the former Pennsylvania governor who has been leading the White House Office of Homeland Security for nearly one year, has been nominated by the president to head the department.

Bush tapped resources including navy officers, directors within the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) and others to create the first defense department for the United States with the goal of terrorist prevention.

The goal for Ridge is to pull together over 150,000 employees in various agencies. In an appearance on "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno," Ridge explained that most of the employees for the department will come from existing agencies.

The idea of Homeland Security first came about after Sept. 11, 2001. As a reaction to the terrorist attacks, Ridge was placed at the helm and initiated unprecedent setting programs. Most notably among these, the color-coded warning system that Ridge put in place has been an item of interest as it has gone from color to color.

Bush was not always an advocate of the separate department. At the outset of the post-Sept. agenda, the president was wary of the Democrat-championed initiative.

In June, however, he fully embraced the idea and used it as a campaign tactic, when bolstering support for Republican candidates.

"The continuing threat of terrorism, the threat of mass murder on our own soil will be met with a unified, effective response," Bush said.

The umbrella agency will take bits and pieces of several disciplines of law enforcement and combine their resources.

Ridge seems optimistic about having the department up and running within the one year timeline Bush has given him. While full transition will likely take longer, the department will start working immediately.

"I don't buy the argument that in the short run, the creation of this department is going to somehow inhibit us in the war against terrorism or in the protection of homeland security," Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Connecticut, said after Bush signed the bill. "In fact, I think it will help us immediately."

Lieberman has been a supporter of the bill and has met opposition as such. Jim Jeffords, the Republican turned Independent from New Hampshire predicts a hindered War on Terrorism as the new department starts up.

"[It will] give the American people a false, false sense of security," Jeffords said.

The bill passed through the Senate earlier this week despite objections that it was partisan. A provision to protect vaccine manufacturers remained in the bill.

Information from CNN was used in this editorial.

Restroom Revolution: a big step

LAMOTHE

When the Restroom Revolution at the University of Massachusetts started to hit the papers and the airwaves at the beginning of October, I think the initial reaction to it by most of the students on campus was predictable: they sighed, they laughed, and then they mouthed, "You've GOT to be kidding me."

Since then, though, the initiative has gained a remarkable amount of steam, even passing through the Student Government Association (SGA) with flying colors (34-12 vote). The members pushing for the Revolution have been active for their cause, handing out literature and hosting a table in the Campus Center.

All of which brings me back to my initial reaction; you've GOT to be kidding me.

The fact that something like this has even been brought up for discussion is something that a large majority of students just shake their heads at.

The Restroom Revolution idea has been met with mixed feelings on campus. In SGA meetings, it was passed on with little dissent. Senators played the politically correct line regardless of how ridiculous the idea that goes along with the motion may have been. They did this for one simple reason – there's very few ways for them to put down the Revolution without people involved in it painting them as close-minded.

There's also the group of people who supported the cause because they're looking for attention. It's the cause of the day for them. Of all of the people who have vocally advocated transgender rights with the Restroom Revolution, not a one of them has come forward as being transgender themselves.

Right or wrong, that limits the credibility of the movement because it makes it look like the leaders of the cause have just found something new to advocate. The Restroom Revolution hasn't necessarily been raised because there are transgender people on campus who wanted to address a concern – it's been addressed to promote the rights of those with sexual lives and identities that are a little out of the ordinary.

For the rest of us, the movement has been a fun topic, the kind of subject that people toss out with winks and nudges and toilet humor jokes mixed in. It can be rather difficult to take the issue seriously.

Perhaps it's that the transgender rights movement hasn't really caught fire yet. Perhaps it's because of the way that the issue has been presented. It's tough to say why we can't take it seriously, and it's not fair to all those fine transgendered folks on campus that we can't.

After all, they put their pants/skirt on one leg at a time just like the rest of us. Wink, wink. Nudge, nudge.

A lot of students look at the movement as though they are being asked to change basic notions of sexuality that they have had since childhood and to throw them to the wind. Men's room, women's room. It's been as simple as that since we were five years old and we went down to the bathroom with the rest of our class in a single file line.

So why change it now? Even if the SGA has accepted the motion, it doesn't mean the entire student body has.

Proponents of the Revolution argue that sex is a social construct, that it's something that society put in place to restrict our freedoms.

They couldn't be more right. The thing is, it's something that's been in place since the beginning of time. Challenge the existence of male versus female? Next perhaps we'll argue what color the sky is.

People involved in the Restroom Revolution need to understand one thing: support for their cause is thin. Support for their cause will remain thin. Even if the motion passes through all phases and becomes University policy, a fair share of students is going to, at best, grudgingly acknowledge it.

> "As ridiculous as the whole thing may seem, renaming one bathroom per building as gender neutral will barely cause a ripple in the way we live our lives. What's the harm in it?"

Nevertheless, I can see their point, and it shouldn't be too difficult to reach some sort of compromise. As ridiculous as the whole thing may seem, renaming one bathroom per building as gender neutral will barely cause a ripple in the way we live our lives. What's the harm in it?

In the end, the whole wacky idea is no big deal to accept. To have a bathroom where the (ahem) "transgendered" on campus can go – I can handle that. As a student body, there's no major concession there.

Our lives will not be greatly changed or affected if we hinitor the movement and it succeeds. It's no big deal.

Shrug, laugh, and let it go.

Finding the perfect man

LINDSEY ELDER

Normally I'm not a fan of columns pertaining to personal subjects like relationships, but I decided there is always room for exceptions. So in this, probably one of the very few columns where I'll refrain from being the friendly campus-conservative and voice of reason, I want to focus on something any of my female readers can appreciate the importance of: the search for the perfect man. It's been a long and tiring hunt, but in my pursuit I realized something you all will as well: that sometimes the best things are right there in front of you, you can't see them.

For the sake of securing his identity, we'll call him "Dravis Tane." For years friends had to told me Dravis and I belonged together. We've all had that devoted matchmaker-friend that, so satisfied in her own life that she decides she's indebted to configuring yours as well. "You're perfect for each other, it would be so cute," she'd say. Meanwhile she had the two of us double dating, she being my best friend in ROTC and her boyfriend Dravis's, for as much as people said we were made to be together, I seemed to be the last person to realize it. As a matter of fact, it took me almost fixing him up with another friend before I realized what a good thing I had.

To truly be the perfect man, he must have all of the qualities and various sides that all women look for in their soul mates. For starters, there's the romantic side. Moonlight and roses may have been the route to a girl's heart before, but now you need to have a little more originality. Dravis has a keen romantic side. Sometimes I'll open my eyes in the morning to find little notes we leave for one another, others I'm being woken up to him throwing Swedish Red Berries at my head. A good indication you've got him is when he gets creative for you. Most ladies receive a plain old box of chocolates from their Valentine. Not me.

My sugar intake for Valentines Day was an abundance of Mike and Ike's wrapped in a U.S. Army Meal-Ready-to-Eat bag.

A fellow soldier, he has that tough guy side down as well. Females are more independent now more than ever before, but at the same time deep down I think we all just want that sense of security that someone will be watching out for us, protect us if need be, without being domineering. Dravis can be protective. As a matter of fact, he's well known to his local law enforcement for protecting his home and family from the "squirrel-with the intent to harm" in his home territory. His neighbors all know and appreciate his efforts, as they called the police to report the brave soul taking out squirrels in his back yard with his B.B. Gun, in his boxer shorts.

Parallel to the tough guy side, you know he's yours when he's willing to make a fool out of himself solely for your entertainment. I firmly believe that Karaoke is the true test to anyone's commitment to another person. If you can get someone like Dravis, a person not used to being in the spotlight, on a stage to sing not only Elvis Presley love songs to you, but "Chocolate Salty Balls" from South Park (without the involvement of alcohol), then yes ladies, your search has been successful. The male gender calls it "whipped," but females call it "committed" when a guy can put his partner's wants and needs before his own. He goes to see "chick flicks" with me, and I'll waste two hours of my life that I can never get back watching someone urinating on a snowcone and then eating it in Jackass: the movie with him.

Opposites attracting is a fact of life, so the sooner you stop looking for a clone or someone who shares all of the same interests as you, the better off you'll be. The "Green acres" complex is probably the most interesting one to try and over come. I've lived in inner city Boston my entire life, and Dravis is the ultimate hick from rural western Massachusetts. My first time taking him home to Boston with me, he spent most of his sight seeing time watching the ground for any firearms that my fellow city dwellers may have dropped. I took him to his first Red Sox game and showed him around, and he pointed out to me what he thought would be the best places to stay if you were homeless in the big city and reminded me when we were approaching "Cope-a-lee."

Opposites attract is always a good factor to keep in mind in relationships because you've got all the bases covered. He's an engineer and can fix anything you might need; I'm a journalist who takes pride in the fact that I can check my own motor oil. I consider myself a people person and look at life as the more the merrier. Dravis is more of an introvert that until you break through the shell, you'll only see his side that classifies everyone not in the military or with hair longer than a wiffle as a "hippie." I have absolutely not patience, especially when it comes to good things. Dravis on the other hand will think things through thoroughly before acting and can wait forever for the good things in life. Thinking things through however made the pivotal "first move" a tough one to finally come across.

Its been an interesting search for the perfect man and with it now over, I suppose from all this my message is not to bow down from the things you want because of fear or nervousness. As a friend of mine once said to me, "Don't be afraid to tell someone you love them. If you do, they might break your heart, but if you don't, you might break theirs." Sometimes it's the matches made in heaven that have the hardest time making things work. Don't be afraid of taking the first step into what seems like the impossible: I can truly say that it is well worth the risk. So, with thousands of my fellow students reading along, I want to say how thankful I am to have taken the advice of my peers and for having made that first move – a hick or not.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – The most common first move in chess is R2, D2. Next time some one challenges you to a competition, immediately say "E2, E4." This will prove that you are aware of the adversary.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You will find yourself incredibly annoyed when your mom replies "LOL" to your request for more money. Sign off without typing "HRB."

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You will be incredibly surprised when a little person named Hector tells you that you look like the lead from "Head of the Class." Offer him a piggyback ride.

PISCES (Feb. 19-Mar. 20) – Seek out an old friend and tell them why you stopped talking to him or her. This will relieve stress and then you can go and sit home, alone.

ARIES (Mar. 21-Apr. 19) – Your roommate will begin to wonder why all the milk is disappearing so quickly. You will claim not to know, but do not let them know that you are keeping a cat in your closet.

TAURUS (Apr. 20-May 20) – You will feel a sudden urge to watch "A Wedding Story" on television. Indulge yourself and spend the day with personal TLC.

GEMINI (May 21-Jun. 21) – Today you will be upset at someone, so use this little trick to calm yourself down. [Editor's Note: Due to Jack Handey's penchant for copyright infringement litigation, this portion of the horoscopes have been removed] After that you will feel a lot better, and no harm done.

LEO (Jul. 23-Aug. 22) – You will be accosted by a talking moose. The moose will actually turn out to be an old woman from South Carolina dressed up as a moose. She will ask you to spare some change out of pity. Don't give her any.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sep. 22) – You suddenly realize that the person sitting next to you while reading this is the same one (of many) you hooked up with freshman year. Smile and just walk away.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You will move out of your current residence and into a room with two sets of bunk beds. You will realize it was the best move you made in your life.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Patience must be a virtue for those that love Scorpios. Always remember that.

Indiana topples UMass

Minutemen to face Gonzaga/Utah loser

Minutemen fall to SJU in third outing

While the meat of a team's season lies in the conference matchups, sometimes the most exciting contests are when two powerhouses from different conferences collide.

On Nov. 23, the Massachusetts men's swimming team had the heavy task of competing against Big East powerhouse St. John's. Both of these teams are among the favorites to win their conferences, but SJU's star power was too much for the Minutemen (2-1, 0-0 Atlantic 10) to handle in the 156-101 loss in Jamaica, N.Y.

UMass	101

"It kind of puts you in your place," sophomore Dylan Smith said. "This makes you realize that there are other teams outside the conference that are strong, too. It brings you back down to reality."

SJU (5-0, 2-0 Big East) had a huge advantage in recruiting just being a member of the Big East conference. The Red Storm roster has athletes from as far nationally as San Antonio, Texas and San Diego, Calif. as well as swimmers from five different locations in Poland. There are only three members from the state of New York listed on the team's roster.

Five different Red Storm athletes captured two victories in the Saturday meet. Seniors Greg Danner and Mikos Cerovic dominated the fly and back events. Danner won both the 100-yard (1:55.5) and 200-yard (50.85) fly, while Cerovic finished first in the 100-yard (52.04) and 200-yard (1:54.53) backstroke.

The three other victorious performers were Pawel Sokolowski, Marcin Fiklpowicz and Arkadiusz Znachowski, all natives of Poland.

Sokolowski flew to wins in the 50-yard (21.13) and 100-yard (46.88) freestyle, while Fiklpowicz paced himself in the distance events, grabbing first in the 500-yard (4:40.43) and 200-yard (1:40.56) freestyle. Znachowski helped with a pair of victories in the breaststroke events with times of 58.74 (100-yard) and 2:09.10 (200-yard).

"It's good to race them," said UMass' sophomore Owen Scollan, referring to the five SJU athletes. "Every time you race someone like that, you improve your own race. You just have go out there and do it, then bring it to practice for the next meet."

Veterans senior Chad Arnold and junior Sean Collins, were able to keep the result respectable with some hard-fought outings. The duo each had a pair of second-place finishes, and Collins added a third-place finish.

The Minutemen look to refocus and train for their next meet, the Yale Invitational, on Dec. 6.

Near-flawless effort propels UNH

By Matt Brady

DURHAM, N.H. – It can be incredibly difficult for a team coming off a pair of emotional contests to play a third game in five days. But when that team consists of the best in the nation, it becomes a little easier.

UNH	4

No. 2 New Hampshire played a near-flawless hockey game en route to dispatching the Massachusetts hockey team 4-0 at the Muttontown Center Sunday. Michael Ayers made 32 saves for his fourth career shutout, while Colin Hemingway put home a pair of goals following a one-game suspension for the Wildcats' (2-2-2, 2-1 Hockey East).

We played an excellent hockey team today, a team that's not only very talented, but extremely well coached and disciplined enough not to have their Grade-A game going for them offensively and still manage to do all the things that are necessary to do to win games," UMass Head Coach Don Cahoon said. "My hat goes off to UNH to be able to come off two really emotional games this week and be able to play a disciplined game without the energy they normally have."

The Wildcats split a pair of conference overtime games on the road this week, upending No. 1 Boston College on Tuesday, but falling to Maine on Friday.

"It's a huge game, and I told the team they should feel really good about the win," UNH Head Coach Dick Umile said. They've beaten a team that's been on a roll and it's a big two points in Hockey East."

The Minutemen (5-5-0, 3-4-0 HE) outshot UNH 32-18, but failed to capitalize on the few opportunities that the hosts gave them. On the most obvious of the Wildcats' lapses, sophomore Tim Vitek stole the puck and made a brilliant pass to Michael Mullen on a 2-on-1. But Ayers was up to the task and stoned the freshman with a sprawling glove save.

"I told Michael it's a great save and one of the best I've seen here," Umile said.

"[Vitek] made a great pass and [Mullen] was all alone and I was lucky enough to get it," said Ayers, who has shut out the Minutemen twice in his career. "I thought that was the only big save I had to make all night."

Hemingway scored what turned out to be the game-winner 12:21 into the first period, taking a shot off a faceoff win by Lanny Gare and clinging it off both posts and into the net.

"You need people who can finish and put the puck away and that's what Colin Hemingway does," Umile said.

The senior, who sat out Friday's overtime loss at Maine after fighting with BC's Patrick Eaves the game prior, also added a power play goal in the second. He took a pass from senior Jim Abbott just outside the crease, and barely got a piece of the puck on a one-timer, but it trickled through UMass netminder Gabe Winer's pads.

"That's like having a changeup thrown at you on a 3-2 count when you're expecting a fastball," Cahoon said. "If the shot was a big-time shapper, he might have made the save."

Winer made just 14 saves in the loss, but made a stellar save on Lanny Gare's shorthanded breakaway. The conference's second-leading scorer anticipated a pass from Kelly Sickavish to Marvin Degon at the middle point and stole the puck to break in all alone. But Winer held his ground and made a solid pad save.

"Every game is a game for Gabe to grow in," Cahoon said. "He's a freshman that's being given an opportunity to play in difficult situations. I don't think Gabe had his best game today by any means, but at the same time he made some very good saves."

The game ended with some bad blood between the two teams, as third-period fisticuffs resulted in 11 third period penalties. The final frame featured a pair of mini-brawls in the final two and a half minutes.

The Minutemen travel north today for the first of a string of three games against East Coast Athletic Conference opponents when they face off against the University of Vermont.

"We've got a day to get this monkey off our backs and then we'll go and get a good night's rest up in Vermont," Cahoon said.

The Minutemen have never won at Gutterson Fieldhouse, but defeated UVM last year at the Springfield Civic Center 2-0. They will then play host to Dartmouth (Saturday) and Princeton (Sunday) this weekend.

Marcus Hogan's (19) shoulder pad shielding skates were visible by goaltender Mike Ayers and a strong UNH defensive effort on Sunday. The Minutemen will look to get back on the winning track tonight against Vermont.

Red Storm swim to triumph over Minutewomen

The Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team fell to St. John's on Saturday in Jamaica, N.Y. by a score of 137-123.

This defeat leaves the Minutewomen 1-2 in dual match contests this season.

St. John's	137
UMass	123

"I would have been really happy if we had won the meet but I'm not that down about losing it," UMass Head Coach Bob Newcomb said.

A standout performance for the Maroon and White came from junior Diana Alberti, who won both the 100 and 200-yard butterfly in times of 59.08 and 2:08.52, respectively.

"[Alberti] really stepped up on Saturday and recorded some of her best times," Newcomb said. "She had an outstanding meet and she looked really strong from the start."

Also impressive for the Minutewomen were junior Christen Dexter and freshman Aimee Bourassa.

Dexter finished first in two events for the Maroon and White, taking maximum points in the 100- and 200-yard breaststroke. Dexter recorded times of 1:02.42 and 2:26.19 in those two events.

Bourassa placed first in the 200-yard freestyle in a time of 1:57.91. "[Bourassa] is definitely a strength for us," said Newcomb of the freshman. "She's learning new things every meet. She had a decent meet."

The only other individual swimmer victorious for UMass was junior Lauren Rowell. The Hamburg, N.Y. native won the 100-yard backstroke in a time of 1:01.57.

Rowell was also part of the triumphant 200-yard medley relay team, along with Dexter, Alberti and senior Lizzy Boyle. The quartet won in a time of 1:50.77.

This victory was very pleasing for Newcomb. "The relay team was good; we have a tradition of our relay teams swimming well," he said.

St. John's was led to victory by juniors Beth Malinowski and Laura Nuudi and freshman Caitlin Ranney, who all won two events apiece. St. John's is now 4-3 for the season.

Due to St. John's dropping their diving program a few years ago, the diving team did not compete against the Red Storm.

"We had four swimmers unable to compete so we were a little short handed at times," Newcomb said.

"Overall it was a solid weekend, we had some high points and we now just move onto the next meet," he added.

That meet is the Yale Invitational, which the Maroon and White will compete in from Dec. 6-8.

UMass Marching Band performs in Canada

By Ferron Salniker
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts Minuteman Band was the featured musical entertainment at the Canadian Football League East Division Championship for the Montreal Alouettes at Olympic Stadium in Montreal, Quebec on Nov. 17.

The 300-member band performed a show consisting of a selection of songs from the movie Gladiator as well as a medley of songs by Madonna. The Minuteman Marching Band received a standing ovation from a cheering crowd of almost 60,000 fans.

Under the leadership of Director George N. Parks, Assistant Director Thomas P. Hamann, and Associate Director Michael I. Klesch, the band performed a halftime show for 57,125 screaming fans. This was the second Minuteman band performance in Montreal. The band preformed there previously in 1998, also at an Alouettes football game.

For Parks, the crowd's reaction was very pleasing. "The crowd let out a cheer that shocked me," he said. "I turned around to look at the field, because I was sure that the home team had just entered the stadium... certainly the crowd couldn't be cheering for a marching band. But I didn't see any team!"

Band members were equally astonished with the reaction from the crowd.

"We didn't expect the crowd to get so excited, but they loved us! They were so into us," said Richardson Muranya, a national exchange student and flute player. "To see the crowd's reaction, I can't explain it really. It was a breathless experience."

When reflecting on their 1998 performance UMass graduates and band alumni Andrea DeGroff and Debra Coleman had fond memories. "It was a challenging performance, with the bigger field and all...performing for a crowd of that size was very rewarding."

"You guys were sensational! Your precision was incredible," Dave Stubbs, a reporter for The Montreal Gazette, said in a recent letter to Parks. "And my kudos to your soloist in MacArthur Park."

The trumpet soloist, senior Donald Clough, is considered one of the best trumpet players on the UMass campus.

The band was led on the field by Drum Majors, Evan Doyle, Michelle Rahaim, Jonathan Korhonen, and Kristy Stoles. Dubbed as "The Power and Class of New England," the Minuteman Marching Band has become the largest band in New England history and has reached many accomplishments including being selected to receive the 1998 Louis C. Sudler Trophy. The Sudler Trophy is awarded each year to recognize one collegiate marching band which demonstrates outstanding ability, utilizes innovative marching techniques and contributes to the American way of life. Other recipients of the trophy include the Michigan, Michigan State

UMass Resident Assistants begin contract negotiations

By Brian Castro
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

After a year of demonstrating and work, the Resident Assistants Union had its first negotiation with University of Massachusetts administrators on Friday, Nov. 15, to discuss a union contract. The negotiations came after nearly two years of trying to get the UMass administration to recognize the RAs as workers and not just as students.

The RAs decided to join the United Auto Workers Union in order to gain security in their jobs as well as pursuing economic improvement. The RAs are paid $50 for 20 hours of work, as well as receiving a free single room.

"It began in the spring of 2001 when the RAs came to talk to us, along with the help of graduate students who were already part of the union," UWA Local 2322 President James A.W. Shaw said. "We had conversations and decided that the forming the union would be a good course of action, but the University of Massachusetts opposed our union and refused to recognize it."

The RA union became official on March 5, 2002, as the RAs voted 138-88 to form their union.

However, the University still refused recognition to the newly formed union, which led to a series of protests, demonstrations and a standoff between police and students. On April 29, police arrested 35 students after a two-hour sit-down by 15 students in the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Office in the Whitmore administration building. Fifteen other students were arrested for refusing to move after blocking a police bus for the detainees.

Six days after the incident, another group of students picketed in front of Associate Provost Susan Pearson's home.

The breaking point came in July when the UAW sat down with administrators and worked out an agreement to set up a bargaining table. In September, the RAs laid out the groundwork and elected officers representing all of the major housing areas to handle the negotiations. The team came together in September and worked throughout the fall to come up with proposals. Those in the committee include Nicholas Demas, Michael Grilley, Michael Travis, Bill Kraus, Anne Marie Watt, Mike Salamone, Pat Hernon, Neil Nugent, and David Symnott.

"It was the first chance for us to meet the University administrators and we mostly went over the ground rules for this bargain," Demas said. "It's going to be a long process, but it feel that we'll accomplish what we started a year ago. I hope at this point that the University can come to an agreement that benefits both sides."

The second of the two meetings was held on Nov. 22. There will be two more meetings during the semester. Negotiations will go into the spring, until both parties can come to an agreement.

"UMass was feeling pressure to block out the union, saying that the RAs were nothing more than rule models and peer leaders," Shaw said.

One of the central issues for the RAs is the susceptibility to losing their job for any reason. In unions, workers have the protection of an impartial arbitrator, not connected to any of the involved parties, and this person is used to assess the reasons for firing a worker and makes a fair decision.

"The RAs want more control over their job and not to be on the chopping block," Shaw said. "The RAs want a reasonable deal, and they've been making very intelligent demands and they're not greedy. They just want to improve the RA position by setting up standards through unionizing."

U.N. inspectors prepare for Iraq interrogation

By Charles J. Hanley
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) – International arms inspectors, "fully conscious" of their responsibility, are ready to fan out over Iraq with the latest detection gear in search of mobile labs, underground factories or other signs the Iraqis are still committed to the deadliest of weapons, top inspectors said Tuesday.

The U.N. team mounts its first field missions Wednesday in what is expected to be months of difficult, detailed inspections of hundreds of Iraqi sites. Its first targets will be installations inspected and "neutralized" in the 1990s.

The future of peace in the Middle East may hinge on the outcome of the search. The United States, steadily reinforcing its military in the region, has warned it will disarm Iraq by force if the inspections fail.

In Washington, White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said President Bush "hopes the inspectors will take their responsibilities very seriously, and he knows they will, to find out whether Iraq has indeed disarmed. And the president thinks this is a healthy process."

If Iraq does not cooperate, Fleischer said, "the president has said he has a policy of zero tolerance, and Saddam Hussein will have to figure out exactly what zero tolerance means."

The monitors are back after a four-year break under a new mandate from the U.N. Security Council to test the Baghdad government's contention that it has no arsenals of weapons of mass destruction, or programs to build them.

Earlier teams of U.N. experts, in seven years' work ending in 1998, destroyed large amounts of chemical and biological armaments and longer-range missiles forbidden to Iraq by U.N. resolutions after the Gulf War, in which an Iraqi invasion force was driven from Kuwait. The inspectors also dismantled Iraq's nuclear weapons program before it could build a bomb.

Chief U.N. inspector Hans Blix says, however, it's "an open question" whether the Iraqis retained some weapons – especially chemical. British and U.S. leaders say they're sure Iraq has such arms, and suspect it also is rebuilding production programs.

Blix said journalists would not be permitted at sites during inspections. However, the Iraqis, anxious to prove their claim of no banned weapons, planned to take a group of journalists to Wednesday's inspection, although it was unclear whether they would be kept outside the site.

A working group of 17 inspectors landed in Baghdad on Monday, the first contingent of some 100 who will be operating in Iraq at any one time by year's end. More than 300 experts are available on the rosters of the two U.N. inspecting agencies — the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, or IAEA, and Blix's New York-based U.N. Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission, or UNMOVIC.

The two local operational chiefs met with reporters in Baghdad on Tuesday, and said they have clear – if secret – game plans for the months ahead.

"We are fully conscious of the responsibility we have on our shoulders," said Jacques Baute of the nuclear watchdog agency.

Demetrius Perricos, the UNMOVIC team leader, was asked whether the arms monitors will look for suspected truck-borne biological weapons laboratories. A recent U.S. intelligence report said an Iraqi document indicated Baghdad "was interested in developing mobile fermentation units" for biological weapons.

This is "not something we find incredible," Perricos said.

"We have some plans," he said. He noted inspectors have the right to stop suspect vehicles on Iraqi roads, but he wouldn't discuss the plans further.

As for possible buried storage or production sites, "we have a strategy for underground facilities" using ground-penetrating radar, Perricos said.

Building a nuclear bomb requires a huge infrastructure, and the IAEA inspectors of the 1990s were able to find and destroy that Iraqi technology. Now, said agency spokeswoman Melissa Fleming, "we'll be looking for signs of renewed nuclear activity in any way, shape or form."

The U.N. inspectors are to report to the Security Council by late January on their initial round of inspections, including whether the Iraqis have been fully cooperative.

The council has warned of "serious consequences" for Iraq if the Baghdad government is found in major violation of the U.N. disarmament demands. Bush has threatened military action against Iraq in that case, with or without U.N. sanction.

Iraq must submit a declaration by Dec. 8 detailing any such weapons programs, as well as nuclear, chemical or biological programs it claims have peaceful purpose. The Iraqis complain that this is too sweeping, encompassing even plastic slippers produced by its petrochemical industry.

If the inspectors eventually certify that Iraq has cooperated fully with their disarmament work, U.N. resolutions provide for the lifting of international economic sanctions imposed on Iraq after it invaded Kuwait in 1990.

The inspections were suspended in 1998 amid disputes over U.N. access to Iraqi sites and Iraqi complaints of American spying via the U.N. operation.

The U.N. teams say they now are interested in up to 900 Iraqi sites. They're expected to focus first on sites surveyed in the 1990s, to check on cameras and other equipment left behind to monitor activity. Later, they're expected to branch out to new sites – for example, suspected storage places for chemical weapons U.S. intelligence alleges are still held by Iraq.

News Briefs: UMass Roundup

UMass research discovers contaminants in Boston Harbor

Contaminated sediments dating back to the Industrial Revolution are being churned away by storms and current, according to research at the University of Massachusetts Boston Harbor. The contaminants could be potentially released during the next 10-20 years, finding their future fate after spills and leaks, the research further claims.

The findings were published in the November/December 2002 issue of the journal Environmental Science and Technology. The Office of Naval Research funded the research.

Scientists proposed that PAHs, that the contaminants called polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons or PAHs, were biodegradable to some degree, but that the biodegradation was retarded when the contaminants were buried in the silt at the bottom. The new research challenges these old beliefs.

"This is important because it demonstrates that the silt particle retention capacity of the harbor is greater than previously documented," said UMass microbiologist Derek Lovley, one of the papers' co-authors.

Marine biochemist Reginald Pulford, who was not involved in the research, commented that the findings "are very important because they show that PAHs, which are known to be toxic to humans, are not biodegradable in the sediments of Boston Harbor."

Sulfate, in the water, appears to be key in the biodegradation of the PAHs, Pulford said. Sulfate, which comes from sulfuric acid and is commonly abundant in seawater, like that of Boston Harbor, is much more abundant than humans use to create PAHs, he elaborated, with the use of sulfate by the microbes. Other factors involved in the research were Dennis Cozzarelli and Latvia

UMass awarded grant for new confocal microscope

The University of Massachusetts was awarding $524,000 by the National Institutes of Health for a confocal microscope for the Central Microscopy Facility. The Zeiss 510 Meta is designed to provide high resolution, three-dimensional information from living cells.

The confocal microscope is a very useful tool for biologists who study the structures within cells, said Patricia Wadsworth, an employee of the Biology Department.

Wadsworth went on to explain that biologists who study the development of 3D embryos can now see previously hard to see structures within the embryo. Cell biologists can now "image changes in living cells, while molecular biologists can pinpoint the location of specific macromolecules. The microscope optically provides views that are just a thin slice from any depth of the sample. The slices are put together by the computer to form a 3D image of the sample.

The researchers now using the new microscope are Wadsworth, David Goode, Alice Cheung, and Susan Cumberledge of Biochemistry and Molecular Biology; Vivian Budnik and Peter Hopfer of Biology; and Barbara Osborne of Veterinary and Animal Sciences.

UMass research team studying causes of acidic drainage from mine

A University of Massachusetts research team is studying why high acidic drainage from an abandoned tilfish mine in the town of Rowe is leaching itself.

Experts from the fields of microbiology, geology, engineering and science education are being assembled to determine the extent and rate of bioremediation. Researchers say their findings may result in quicker natural clean-ups in mines throughout the world. The team received a $1.39 million dollar grant from the National Science Foundation's "Biocomplexity in the Environment" program. The program has only funded 10 projects this year nationwide.

The drainage waters in the mine, which collapsed in 1911, are more acidic than vinegar, with a pH of around two. They carry large amounts of metals including zinc, copper and iron. Researchers stress that there is no threat to local water supplies or environments because the iron sulfide in the water contains few hazardous impurities.

Assistant Professor of Microbiology, Klaus Nusslein, will try to determine what microorganisms are oxidizing the acids and metals, while geologist Richard Yuretich will study the role that geology plays in the natural clean up.

The town of Rowe is located in Western Massachusetts, near the Vermont border.

UMass researchers awarded grant to study muscles

University of Massachusetts researchers, working with those from Yale University School of Medicine and Springfield's Baystate Medical Center, received a five-year, $1.4 million grant from the National Institute on Aging. The grant is to fund a study on the changes in the way muscles work as people age.

Non-invasive and high technology methods are being used to measure the magnitude and mechanics of skeletal muscle fatigue on two groups of male and female volunteers of various ages (one group will be comprised of groups between 20-35, while the other will span the ages between 65 and 85.) The actual measurement of muscle function will take place at both the University of Massachusetts and the Magnetic Resonance Spectroscopy Research and the Resonance Imaging Facility at Yale. The project began in October.

In addition to fatigue, the researchers will study how muscles are activated by the brain, how energy is supplied for muscular contraction, whether muscular blood flow changes with age and whether or not muscle functions are affected by that change. Researchers are also looking as to whether or not gender plays an issue in muscular function.

"We are very excited about this project," said UMass Associate Professor of Exercise Science Jane Kent-Braun, the chief investigator on the project.

UMass faculty member named Distinguished Veterinary Immunologist

The American Association of Immunologists named University of Massachusetts Department of Veterinary and Animal Sciences faculty member Cynthia Lee Baldwin as the Distinguished Veterinary Immunologist of 2002.

The award recognizes Baldwin's research achievement in the veterinary immunologs field. Baldwin received a plaque earlier this week at the annual Conference of Research Workers in Animal Diseases, which was held in St. Louis, Mo. Baldwin's research focuses on the bovine cellular immune system, with a particular focus on the biology of gamma delta T cells and the development of vaccines against significant microbial pathogens.

U.N. finds as many women as men are infected with HIV

By Emma Ross
Associated Press

LONDON (AP) – For the first time in the 20-year history of the AIDS epidemic, about as many women as men are infected with HIV, a United Nations report says.

The report, presented Tuesday in London, paints a dismal picture of a disease invading regions of the globe where it had for many years tricked experts into believing some populations might be less susceptible, or even immune, to infection.

"It's once more a sad story – 42 million people living with HIV today, 5 million new infections in 2002 and 3.1 million (who have) died from AIDS this year," said Dr. Peter Piot, executive director of the U.N. AIDS agency.

The report said 38.6 million adults and 3.2 million children under age 15 have HIV. Of the adults, 19.2 million people being infected, but also an increase in the number of countries now facing epidemics, said Dr. Bernhard Schwartlander, director of the HIV/AIDS division at the World Health Organization.

For example, 10 years ago HIV was confined to small areas of Eastern Europe. Today, every country in the region has an HIV problem.

"We have seen that no society is immune," Schwartlander said. "Even though HIV was quite well established in many Asian countries very early on, we had seen a very stable low rate in a number of countries. It was just at the point in time where people were starting to think maybe these societies are immune. We have been shown different."

"In Indonesia, after many years of silence, of very low rates," an epidemic is growing, Schwartlander said. "Of course HIV was there, but it didn't really lead to major epidemics. It was just over the past couple of years that massive spread of HIV has begun, initially in injecting drug users."

In China, where HIV was "virtually nonexistent" a few years ago, there are now 1 million people with HIV, and the number could well rise to 10 million by the end of the decade, he said. Again, drug use is a major factor.

Sub-Saharan Africa is still by far the worst-affected region. The situation there also reflects the spread of AIDS among women, with about twice as many young women as men infected.

In 2001, six percent to 11 percent of women between the ages of 15 and 24 years old had HIV, compared with between three percent and six percent of men in the same age group.

It is particularly difficult for women in this region to take precautions against HIV because of their subordinate position in society. Rape is common in some countries.

The phenomenon of intergenerational sex is also driving much of the epidemic in southern Africa, where between one-quarter and one-third of older men are HIV positive.

On the eve of the first inspection, Iraq's official news agency reported that Iraqi air defense batteries fired Tuesday at American and British warplanes that carried dozens of sorties in the northern and southern "no-fly zones," which were established to protect Kurds and Shiite Muslims from Iraqi forces.

However, Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Dave Lapan disputed the Iraqi account, saying that no Iraqi fire was detected in either no-fly zone on Tuesday. Coalition aircraft did not fly over the northern zone Tuesday, and patrols over the southern zone were unhindered, he said.

The United States considers such acts a violation of the U.N. resolutions governing inspections, but has little support for that view among the rest of the Security Council.

Israeli aircraft missile kills militant leaders

By Mark Lavie
Associated Press

JERUSALEM (AP) – Israeli aircraft firing a missile struck a building in the Jenin refugee camp in the West Bank late Tuesday, killing two local leaders of Palestinian militant groups, witnesses and doctors said.

They were identified as Alah Sabhagh, of the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades militia, affiliated with Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement, and Imad Sawiti, leader of the Islamic group Hamas in the area. They were in the same room on the first floor of the building when a missile came through the window and exploded, rescue workers said.

The Israeli military had no immediate comment. A few hours earlier, Israeli forces had moved into Jenin, at the northern edge of the West Bank.

Israel claims the right to target and kill Palestinians suspected of planning attacks. Palestinians and human rights groups object to the practice, calling it summary execution with no judicial process and an attempt to wipe out Palestinian leaders.

In political developments, Palestinian officials acknowledged Tuesday that it was increasingly unlikely general elections will be held as scheduled on Jan. 20, as Israel's governing Likud Party prepared for a leadership primary to be held this week ahead of a national election also set for January.

Both developments could influence international peace efforts.

In Israel, hardline political parties that have opposed concessions to the Palestinians are leading in the polls, while the plan to hold Palestinian elections was a vital part of reforms in Arafat's administration, which Israel and the U.S. government believe are a condition for progress toward peace.

Palestinian officials are hesitating to announce a postponement of the January election for president and parliament, but the Election Commission has not managed to meet even once to begin organizational work.

Palestinian Cabinet Minister Saeb Erekat said he was "not hopeful" the elections would be held as scheduled and blamed Israel, whose troops have been in control of most West Bank cities since mid-June, when Israel responded to Palestinian suicide bombings with a large-scale West Bank invasion.

"The Israeli government has done nothing but obstruct our efforts," he said. "We haven't been able to register voters or train people for this huge process."

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and his challenger, Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, tried to drum up last-minute support at rallies and meetings. Sharon holds a double-digit lead in polls of Likud Party members ahead of Thursday's vote.

In an unusual twist, each man this week offered the other the post of foreign minister in a future government. The two are bitter personal rivals, but in the past have differed little ideologically, both favoring a tough stand toward the Palestinians and opposing far-reaching concessions proposed by dovish governments.

However, Netanyahu has tried to portray Sharon as having grown soft, seizing especially on Sharon's statements expressing an acceptance of an eventual Palestinian state on at least some of the lands the Palestinians seek. Netanyahu says he opposes Palestinian independence entirely.

Bush administration pressuring for blockage of terrorist funds

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – The Bush administration is stepping up pressure on Saudi Arabia to block the flow of money to terrorists, and working groups throughout the U.S. government are considering ways to tighten controls worldwide.

"The president believes that Saudi Arabia has been a good partner in the war against terrorism, but even a good partner like Saudi Arabia can do more," White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said Tuesday.

The U.S. drive, which extends beyond Saudi Arabia to several other countries, is being taken with care. The administration wants support from the Arab monarchs in the event of war with Saudi Arabia's neighbor Iraq, and two senior U.S. officials said the Saudis agreed – "with a wink and a nod" – to help, provided use of its territory was limited.

"We are working continually to find ways to help nations to do more and are exploring concrete ways to do it," Fleischer said.

The working groups are focusing on drying up financial support for terror, but they have not settled on specific recommendations, and none has been approved, another senior official said.

"But it's appropriate to have a broad group look at a number of options, so it's helpful to have ideas kicked around," Fleischer said.

At the same time, the administration is pressing Saudi Arabia to monitor Islamic charities to make sure that contributions do not go to terrorists, another senior official said.

In Mexico City for talks, Secretary of State Colin Powell said the Saudis understand U.S. concern, considering most of the Sept. 11 terror suspects came from the Arab kingdom.

"But we should not in our concern and our desire to protect ourselves go to the point where we rupture relations with a country that has been a good friend of the United States," Powell said at a news conference.

No action against Saudi Arabia was being considered, he said, but the Bush administration has told Saudi Arabia of U.S. misgivings about financing of charitable organizations that result in money going to suspect individuals.

The flow of money from Saudi Arabia and other countries to extremists in Yemen and elsewhere was continued, meanwhile, by Abd al-Kareem al-Iryani, special adviser to Yemeni President Ali Abdullah Saleh.

"No Arab government supports extremists," al-Iryani said in a luncheon at the Brookings Institution. "But there is money in the world coming to those people."

The Yemeni official said Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries have limited banking systems and cannot keep track of the contributions. He stressed the financing problem was far bigger than just Saudi Arabia.

Sen. Richard Lugar, who becomes chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in January, said in an interview Tuesday that the United States should insist Saudi Arabia do more to stop the financing of terror, "with the implied threat the United States will take charge of the situation, and we will attempt to impose some controls."

"This is a time that firmness ought to be on the part of the United States," said Lugar, R-Ind.

Meanwhile, Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill and senior officials in his department are reaching out to allies in the Middle East and in Europe to block funds for terror groups.

As terrorist financiers are forced out of the traditional banking system, they are turning to riskier ways to move money, including smuggling cash and cigarettes; trafficking in diamonds, gold and drugs; and siphoning money from charitable donations, Treasury officials say.

Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld said more than $100 million had been frozen worldwide. "We are getting good cooperation," he said at a news conference.

The drive to intercept funds for terror groups was begun months before recent news reports that a charitable contribution by Princess Haifa al-Faisal, wife of the Saudi ambassador to the United States, may have indirectly helped two of the men who participated in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in New York and Washington that killed more than 3,000 people.

U.S. interagency teams have made several trips to Saudi Arabia, and the Saudis have sent officials to Washington to help identify groups that may be a source of funds for terror operations, a senior U.S. official said Tuesday.

Undersecretary of State Alan Larson, Assistant Secretary of State William Burns and Francis Taylor, who headed the State Department's office to counter terror, are among American officials who have gone to Riyadh in the past few months.

Rep. Michael Rogers, R-Mich., who was on his way home from a trip to the Middle East, said Saudi Arabia had shown "some really great signs" of cooperating against terror.

But, Rogers said in a telephone interview from London, "They've shown some signs that they may, in fact, be encouraging pretty extreme behavior in fundamentalist Islam."

"We still need to continue to put pressure on them to open up, to democratize, to be better neighbors in the Middle East," Rogers said.

Sonic Youth strike chord at Calvin

By Matthew Despres
COLLEGIAN STAFF

SONIC YOUTH
WITH LIARS AND YEAH YEAH YEAHS
Calvin Theater
Nov. 22

NORTHAMPTON — From dust to dust they create not I recall.

Little more than a year from the day they last took to the Calvin's weathered stage, Sonic Youth (Thurston Moore, Kim Gordon, Steve Shelley, Lee Ranaldo and Jim O'Rourke) emerged on Friday with a renewed sense of energy, peaking with the release of the acclaimed Murray Street, a melodically driven contribution to a catalogue some 20 years deep; the last 12 months have been satisfying ones for the band. Revered in print, they have since hauled the album through the time honus test, a release tour across South America and Europe. If nothing else, the results, culled on sentiments, they've artfully connected part to present and reaffirmed that each step they've taken along the way remains as relevant as the last.

That relevance is in no danger of complacency, either. Sure, they've had their obtuse moments along the way, but unlike most rock scene vets who coast the middle ground and call it art, Sonic Youth still paint with abstract strokes and manage to reign in the Jean marie. Comfortable working the orchestrated drone—straight rock taunts and hiss in the blank art precise—they're the thinking fans-fund that succeeds because their music is too damn exciting to ignore.

"Candle" and "Bull in the Heather"—the favored opening cuts two punch as of late set the table but it was "Rain on Tin" that the broke the evening open three songs in. A sprawling test of how far five musicians can push it, indeed to the breaking point, the song tested the potential a limited of last year and exercised the upper register of the band's ability.

Much of the new material has been transformed through a similar evolution. The sweat, weight and improvisation a year on the road allows for has matured the album—the course of the evening saw Murray Street played in its entirety—and the band knows it. From the freak out breakdown of "Radical Adults Lick Godhead Style" and the exponential "Empty Page" to the Lee Ranaldo led "Karenology," the band rang with a confidence that came through in song—with no apologies to the Sonic "purists" lurking out there who yearn for more Confusion is Sex, the new tracks rank among the bands very best work.

And they mix well with the liberal extractions from the back catalogue. Gordon took over the reigns on "Kissability" from the seminal Daydream Nation and stepped to the fote on the brash, accusatory "Plastic Sun." "Skip Tracer" brought Washing Machine roaring back into the live fold, rendered expertly despite a tripped-up beginning from Moore that elicited grins from both the audience and his band.

Both reactionary and premeditated, the band set unique routes all evening that led back to the songs. It also doesn't hurt that Shelley, who remains one of rock's most rhythmic and creative drummers, holds the bottom ground while the others delight in obscuring rock conventions above him. Also a credit is O'Rourke, who approaches the musician's occupation with a producer's instinct (he produced Wilco's Yankee Hotel Foxtrot). Capable of bending on the fly, he knows where the songs are going and how to expand their texture.

Which is of course, what continues to define and fuel a band like Sonic Youth—with little regard for commerce, the genuine pleasure they derive from playing with one another is written all over the stage; in every roll of feedback shot forth from tweaked out fazzmasters, in every misstep that landed an instant of artist-audience sonergy. That they can make a memory from a mistake is evidence enough of that.

Liars and Yeah Yeah Yeah's proved to be unstoppable as openers. From the outright fury of "Art Star," whose more chaotic moments were bound by an insatiable groove cut into the verse, they defied the limitations three piece outfits often work under. Sniper Karen O's slither across stage and piss-off vocals recalled the best of P.J. Harvey and meshed well between drummer Brian Chase and guitarist Nick Zinner's angular progressions. Turn off your television and listen up: the past, present and future of rock is alive, well, and in your backyard. Do yourself a favor and invite it in.

Amos weaves her fairy tale for an enthusiastic crowd

TORI AMOS
Tsongas Arena
Nov. 19

LOWELL — Last Tuesday evening, people flocked to the Tsongas Arena, all drawn by a common adornment for Tori Amos. Crowds waited in line outside with tickets clutched eagerly in hand as breaths filled the frigid air with ephemeral clouds of anticipation. I could feel my heart racing as the gates were dropped as we were allowed inside; for this was to be my first time seeing Amos in person, a far cry from the limitations imposed by my Discman.

We all gathered into the venue and found our respective seats only to wait even longer—for the preparations were running later than expected. In fact, the delay apparently caused the deletion of Amos' opening act for the evening, Howie Day (a 23-year old crooner and label mate from Bangor, Maine). As a musician myself who has toured as the opening act for a band, I felt rather sympathetic towards him and upset that I was not able to hear this up-and-coming singer/writer, but also guilty that my desires to see Amos' graceful form take to the stage overshadowed all other emotions during my pre-emptive expectations.

With little warning, the lights in the arena cut to black, and Amos' soothing "Wampum Prayer"—an a capella song from her new album Scarlet's Walk—filled our ears. After this sullen intonation, the red curtain dropped and her drummer and bassist sparked their distinct sound into a lilting groove. Amos then ran onto the stage with a smiling countenance and bowed graciously to the audience, bringing her hands together in a prayer-like gesture of appreciation. She then sought out the spiritual extension that is her piano and as she set her fingers to the keys, blossoms of her unique keyboard stylings began to unfold into the opening verse of "A Sorta Fairytale." The first single to be released from Scarlet's Walk.

She then moved smoothly into "Sugar," a live favorite of many fans. She then launched into "Cruel," a song from her major debut album that was many people's first exposure to her sometimes difficult but exquisitely mature world of sound and imagery. Her extended performance of the song traversed what must have been 10 minutes, and was without a doubt the most emotional part of the evening for myself and many others. Not only did it have an immense nostalgic value, but the passion with which she played was still as alive, if not more so, as when it was written.

After this harrowing performance she migrated seamlessly into an eclectic mix of songs, including "Crars"—also from the new album, and "Take to the Sky," a limited B-side that was exhilarating in its experience. Her Upon singing "Wednesday"—the other musicians left the stage and she played a few songs alone at the piano. She began this set by singing a lovely little song in which she compared the concert hall to a dining room in a successful attempt at creating a more intimate performance space, bringing us closer to her realm of deep expression.

While she did this, a small veil dropped down from above the stage and lit up reading "Roadside Cafe." This made the atmosphere even more intimate, as if to be transported within a cafe. The subsequent song set us faded "Silent All These Years," "Cloud on my Tongue," and her delicate rendition of Leonard Cohen's "Famous Blue Raincoat."

There has been some debate among Amos devotees as to how her performances compare to their previous counterparts. Many believe that when she plays with her piano solely at hand it is "pure." Amos standing axis either musician's superficiality attitude and no frame who shuts this moment were gladly stifled during the reception of the concert.

Personally, I believe that Amos' essence shines through regardless of the instrumental setting. After her brief hiatus returned to the stage, they finished the main part of the show with a dynamic variety of songs pairing each song back to back as "Caught a Little Sneeze" and "Parasol" and playing early "Spring Haze." Then then left the stage but returned to play three encores for our unsatisfied ears including the crowd-pleasing "Cornflake Girl." The concert ended at last after two and a half hours of bliss. Her Jupiter.

Overall the performance was filled with memorable others. Many crooned the verse of a song that Amos was singing up to, dance when the musicians played a long instrumental songs. Amos' energy never ceased, and singing was palpable even from the nosebleed seats. Amos' energy, playing and songwriting was a testament to her unique talent and her delicate rendition of Leonard Cohen's "Famous Blue Raincoat."

MacMasterful night of fiery fiddling

Canadian singer gives taste of Cape Breton music

By Chris Flouton-Barnes
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NATALIE MACMASTER
Calvin Theatre
Nov. 23

NORTHAMPTON — Natalie MacMaster treated a full house at the Calvin Theater to a lively program of Cape Breton music Saturday night in Northampton.

As the lights dimmed over the hushed crowd, the sound of bagpipes filled the hall. With the lone piper easing into an accelerating beat, a lithe figure bounded onstage in a cascade of blonde hair, fiddle and bow in hand. The lights came up, the band kicked in and MacMaster rose through a lightning set of reels that first of many she would play over the course of the next two hours.

The music continued apace as pianist Allan Dewar launched into a lively clog accompanying MacMaster's fiddle with sturdy left hand lines. This was followed by a suave Latin groove with Brad Davidge styling a smooth flamenco tinged solo on acoustic guitar.

MacMaster finally stepped to the mic to greet an enthusiastic crowd that shouted out a warm welcome to the Canadian virtuoso. She responded to the amicable vibe with "Eternal Friendship," a tune penned in Denmark by Phil Cunningham.

The band shifted gears with a cover of "Jas Down Sally," offering a looping arrangement replete with banjo as the crowd sang along to the chorus. MacMaster joked that the song was by old favorite "Eric MacClapton" before condensing the stage for a segment patterned after the ubiquitous kitchen ceilidhs found throughout her native Cape Breton. The audience thrilled to the entrance of three stepdancers clad in bright dresses of rich brocade.

The lively staccato steps and bouncing curls of the dancers prompted MacMaster to give a few steps of her own during the next set of jigs. She then slowed the pace down for the wistful set-starter "Blue Bonnets Over the Border" from her most recent studio album In My Hands.

For the next set of tunes MacMaster quipped that it was in the "Canadian key" of "Eh?" This traditional progression of a march strathspey and reel featured Matt MacIsaac switching from the whistle back to the bagpipes.

MacMaster showed her impressive technique on a strathspey written by a great Scottish fiddler of the influential J. Scott Skinner. Anchored by the fleet notes of "Tullochgorum," this set ended with Natalie playing alone stunning the crowd with sawdropping agility as she plunged ahead at breakneck speed.

Bassist John Chiasson then regaled the theater with a straight forward rendition of the standard "Autumn Leaves," complementing a clear and slightly flinty voice with subtle melods on his upright bass. Davidge and MacMaster each took a nice turn with simple but lyrical solos.

The penultimate selection featured an extended dance from MacMaster as she showed off a variety of moves from traditional Cape Breton steps to a convincing moonwalk. Miche Pouliot delivered a mesmerize drum solo, but was a noted presence throughout the evening with a range of percussive moods and tones and concise stick work.

MacMaster returned for an encore that was as exhilarating as it was unrelenting. From the jaw grind of an Appalachian hoedown to a reprise of the stepdancing girls, MacMaster skipped and whirled across the stage, her shimmering belt buckle glinting in the lights. The crowd clapped along to the blistering reels and roared its approval when she drew the final notes from her smokin' fiddle.

After the show, I had the chance to talk with Natalie about the tour, a Halloween party she went to with her husband's family, and the DVDs that were getting played on the tour bus. (For the curious folk out there, the answer is Prince and Dave Matthews.) She was just as charming and personable as she appeared onstage, and was comfortable and gracious with everyone who stated to chat with her. MacMaster noted that this current tour had drawn especially great crowds that really got into the music with her.

Natalie MacMaster comes from an almost royal lineage of Cape Breton fiddlers by way of uncle to the peerless Buddy MacMaster. But as she demonstrates year after year, Natalie has come into her own light as the most visible proponent of this cherished heritage. Blessed is substantial man stream appeal set grounded in the tradition and culture of the fiery island of Cape Breton. MacMaster's thrilling audiences by world over and Northampton was just the latest stop for this dynamic star.

Corgan tries for a reinvention with Zwan

ROCK'N' OUT
With Samara Harbestone

Alright guys, I don't know about this one.

It's one thing to try to reinvent yourself for a musical audience that admires you, no much for one thing. It's another thing to actually think that they will accept the "new you" and forget that you were once the revolutionary singer of one of the best bands of the 90s, the Smashing Pumpkins.

I honestly have no clue what Billy Corgan's think ing. I mean, I didn't expect let Corgan to retire and play golf every Sunday morning at the end of his days as the lead singer of the Smashing Pumpkins in the late 90s. I'm sure that once you are a rock star, it's kind of hard to just sit at home and think of what to do next after the breakup of your band. So, what's Corgan's next move?

Make a new band, of course!

Corgan is now the lead singer of his new band Zwan, along with guitarists Matt Sweeney and David Pajo, drummer Jimmy Chamberlin, and bassist Paz Lenchantin.

I guess that Corgan thought that Zwan would be a "fresh start" for his new band, but I personally think that it sounds like a blatant rip-off of Nirvana's green album. Besides that, who knows what other people might think of Zwan? It definitely hopes that the band would become one of the most famous musicians of all time, right?

Reprise Records will release their debut album on January 21, 2003. Entitled "Mary Star of the Sea," the album will feature 11 songs. Among the songs on the album are "Honestly," a song released to fans the week of Sept. 9th on MTV.com. Corgan says that "Honestly" is supposed to "depict the baby stage" of Zwan, as it was the first song that the band ever wrote.

It would be a completely different look and sound from the Smashing Pumpkins, Corgan says.

Alright, dude. I don't want to sound pessimistic, but I don't think that you're going to be as successful with Zwan as you were with the Smashing Pumpkins. I mean, I'm sure that Zwan is "awesome," but will it be as successful as the Pumpkins were? How many people do you think will buy your album?

Let me get something straight. I'm not trying to discourage people to try new things. I think that it's a little ignorant of Corgan to think now that he can just drop his new image and his new musicians (such as "former Smashing Pumpkin" Jimmy Chamberlin), Corgan and his new band Zwan will become successful. I know that he will be relevant in the world of musical career. He's kind of a musical genius, and an active who had a phenomenal career as the Smashing Pumpkins' lead singer. I just don't think that he couldn't get any more musical success than he already has. I can't open the music section of my local newspaper without seeing something different. I think that Corgan should take the same road as Stone Temple Pilots' frontman Scott Weiland. But that's just my opinion.

So let's see what happens, right?

Maybe Corgan will impress us all and prove to us that he's not just another one of the has-been rock singers that are trying to make a comeback. I'm willing to give Zwan a chance, and I'm sure that many fans will be willing to do the same. Only time will tell if Zwan will be successful or not.

Until then, I'm going to listen to my Smashing Pumpkins albums.

SENIOR CO-CAPTAIN KATIE NELSON HAD 14 POINTS, SINK 4-6 FREE THROWS IN THE FINAL MINUTE TO LIFT UMASS TO A VICTORY OVER SAINT PETER'S.

UMass squeaks by SPC

Minutewomen shoot 28 percent in contest

JERSEY CITY, N.J. – It was a recipe for disaster.

Monday night at the Yanitelli Center, facing Saint Peter's College, the Massachusetts women's basketball team scored 16 points in the first half. It turned the ball over 22 times in the game. The Peahens had a 10-point advantage in the middle of the second half. UMass center Jen Butler's final stats read as follows: eight points on three-for-14 shooting. And the rest of the squad's shooting wasn't any better, 28 percent from the field.

Saint Peter's	49

But three clutch free throws by sophomore guard Katie Nelson, 12 points from senior guard Ebony Pegues in the second half and a 24-9 run by the Minutewomen spanning nine minutes of the second frame was just the right amount of productive play to turn a recipe for disaster into a recipe for success. UMass was able to narrowly defeat Saint Peter's, 52-49. With the victory, the Minutewomen are now 2-0 while SPC dropped to 0-2 on the year.

"I had a sense that we are a team that has the capability to have a game like this and it was proven to me today," Massachusetts Head Coach Marnie Dacko said. "I was happy to get the win on the road, even though it was a squeaker win."

At the end of the first half, the score was 22-16 in favor of Saint Peter's. In the first frame, the Minutewomen were marred by some horrendous shooting. They shot 22.6 percent from the field and went 9:42 without a point. It was the lowest scoring first half for UMass in two years.

"At halftime, I told them good teams find a way to win and initially we found every way to lose the ball... we had bad entry passes and no flow on the offensive end," Dacko said. "They put some pressure on us, denied some passes and we got flustered. We are not going to win ball games looking to create [by ourselves], we are going to win ball games by passing the ball and looking for our teammates."

SPC continued to apply full-court pressure in the second half, forcing UMass to set up a press break offense in the backcourt. Early on, the Peahens won the battle of press defense vs. press offense as Saint Peter's jumped out to a seven-point lead in the second frame.

"[SPC] did a great job of pressuring us," said Pegues, who had 14 points on five-for-13 shooting. "They rattled us a little bit."

The Minutewomen didn't seem any more rattled than four minutes into the second half, when Lindsay Gonzalez, the speedy Peahens point guard, stole the ball away from Nelson on the right side of the court, executed a hesitation dribble to fool Pegues, and finished with a scooping layup under the outstretched arms of Butler. Butler fouled Gonzales on the play, putting her on the line for an "and one" opportunity. Gonzales made the foul shot and SPC was up 27-20 on the Minutewomen.

The Peahens were atop UMass for most of the second frame. Their largest lead came at the 10:07 mark when Saint Peter's center Anna Barthold – who had a game-high 16 points – hit two free-throws, giving her team a 10-point lead at 33-23.

But with just over nine minutes to go in the game, the Maroon and White comeback began as Nelson squared up from behind the arc and nailed her only field goal of the game – a three-pointer that hit nothing but nylon. The trey cut the deficit to four at 33-29. Nelson finished the game with eight points on one-of-six shooting. Five of those six shots came from downtown.

Four minutes later, UMass put itself back into a position to win the game when they tied the score at 37-37 on a Pegues wide-open layup. It was the first time the score was tied since 2-2 with 17:32 left in the first half.

Pegues continued to add to the UMass comeback, putting the Minutewomen up for good when she drilled a three-pointer from the left side with a minute and a half to go in the game – giving UMass the advantage, 45-42.

SPC put Nelson on the line twice in the final minute of play. Showing she has ice in her veins, Nelson hit three-of-four from the charity stripe en route to the Minutewoman victory.

Despite the win, Dacko was concerned with her team's effort.

"In the morning during the shoot-around it was pretty intense and then during warm-ups we had a breakdown, so I have to watch this team," she said. "This will be one of those games when I can say, 'Remember Saint Peter's.'"

CENTER JEN BUTLER GRABBED 20 REBOUNDS IN THE MINUTEWOMEN'S SECOND WIN OF THE YEAR.

Despite 'stupid play,' Pegues a savior

By Andrew Merratt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

JERSEY CITY, N.J. – When the Minutewomen walked into the locker room at halftime Monday night, the coaches' goal in talking them in the huddle was not to erase the eight-point deficit that had been given to the court. Rather, it was the first half that got them down.

In fact, it was so bad, both perfor[illegible] were aware of that [illegible]. Like most of her [illegible], Pegues had been immobi[illegible] and completely fazed by a fast, pressing Saint Peter's defense that at times [illegible]. It would never let the [illegible] reach half court.

With the score 22-16 in favor of the Peahens at the half, UMass needed [illegible] to work the offense, and Ebony Pegues was the one to do it. Mid-[illegible] first half, two points, one [illegible] Pegues started making [illegible] second frame and pumped in 12 points, including a momentum-swinging three pointer and three more from the line.

Just as Pegues had been a liability in the first half, becoming overzealous with the ball and missing plenty of jump shots, the 5'6" senior turned her game around, and the Minutewomen's chances in the process.

"Ebony's important to the comeback, and she's also one that can dig us in a hole," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "She was one that I was ready to yank because she puts her head down, but then again, she comes back and makes some big moves, stepped up and made some good three point shots."

In a game of missed opportunities and quiet offenses, Pegues found a way to break Saint Peter's full court press, even if it took a couple of home run outlet passes down the court. While she may not have expected it, Pegues was happy to be the one to initiate the Minutewomen's inspired comeback.

"I don't think we were sure where it was going to come from, but wherever it came from, we're happy," Pegues said. "It feels a little better that I know it came from me."

"I think I kind of led the negatives, so I had to lead some positives there. We just needed something to lift us."

Along with the positives of Pegues' role in the UMass comeback, however, goes a fairly ominous drawback.

"She does stupid things," Dacko said. "If she could keep it a blue-collar routine, I'd prefer it. I don't need anything flashy. She knows exactly what we mean as coaches, and hopefully we'll teach her."

Evidence of this was on display with just five minutes left in the game, Pegues stepped into a passing lane and made an impressive play, deflecting a pass directly to junior Judit Zsedenyi, who then found a streaking Pegues just past the half court line.

With no Peahens between her and the basket, all Pegues had to do was go straight in, and put the layup in the net. Instead, she got to the middle of the key, and waited for the defender to catch up and foul her. In a sign of the way things were going for the Minutewomen in the second half, Pegues got the foul and the basket, but she could have very easily missed the layup, possibly ending up with no points on the play.

"I know I helped my team get down," she said, "so the only thing you can do is help them get up, whatever it is."

In an ugly game, Pegues made some ugly plays. But more importantly, she made the second half plays that helped lead the Minutewomen to their second victory of the season.

"We needed somebody to step up," sophomore Katie Nelson said. "We had a low scoring first half. No one was really picking the team up scoring-wise, so it was good for [Pegues] to put up a few baskets. It probably boosted our confidence a little, and it definitely helped us win."

SENIOR EBONY PEGUES WAS THE CATALYST IN THE MAROON AND WHITE COMEBACK AS SHE SCORED TWELVE POINTS IN THE SECOND HALF.

Backup QB shines in NFL's Week 12

What a Monday Night Football game. I would have lost a bundle on that one, if that is I had a bundle to lose.

It's pretty amazing that the Eagles were able to win without star quarterback Donovan McNabb, who many considered one player that team just couldn't lose. So Rob Johnson. I mean Noah Webster. I mean Ty Detmer. I mean Teen Wolf. I mean – who was that hippie-looking guy playing quarterback for the Eagles Monday?

Oh, right. Koy Detmer, who, [illegible] best impersonation of a guy with talent, was under center for Andy Reid's team. Detmer was impressive, completing 18 of 26 pass attempts for 227 yards and two touchdowns and running for another score. Detmer hurt his non-throwing elbow in the win, but third stringer A.J. Feeley (who?) threw for another score in the team's 38-17 butt whipping over San Francisco.

So, is it the system or the quarterback?

I honestly don't know anymore, maybe next week Reid will let Mr. Ed take some snaps so we can finally answer the question.

My fantasy team

Lonesome Sundays made it five wins in a row this week behind an amazing performance from Priest Holmes, the best player in fantasy football. My record is now up to 7-5 and I sit in a tie for second place. With one week left in the regular season and a one-game deficit between Sundays and the first-place team, there's still a shot, baby.

Then come the playoffs.

Just one thing scares me about the playoffs. I'm like Jim Mora in fantasy football playoffs. No matter how good my team is or what kind of roll it is on, I can't win in the playoffs. Last year, my team was easily the best in my division. It was putting up amazing points each of the last five weeks heading into the postseason and then everyone sucked for round one and I got my rear kicked by the fourth place team.

That will cause you to lose some sleep. Trust me on this one.

If this was college football...

Here is how my top five would look (there are only five because I'm tired and I want to go home for Thanksgiving):

1. Tampa Bay (9-2) – The grudge matches were already going strong between the Bucs and the Packers, but after this week's insanity involving Packers coach Mike Sherman and Tampa lineman Warren Sapp, this is going to start getting ugly. The Bucs have the best defense in the league and the offense is doing enough to win. I don't expect them to go far in the playoffs, but they deserve this spot for now – they are 8-1 since a week one overtime loss to New Orleans.

2. Oakland (7-4) – If the playoffs started today, the Raiders would have to be the favorites to win it all. They are, by far, the hottest team in the NFL right now and Rich Gannon is unstoppable.

Apparently, the prune juice is helping.

Don't believe the hype, though. Come playoff time, the old folks will be looking for their blankets and cowering from teenagers once again.

3. Philadelphia (8-3) – Okay, I'm a believer now. If you can win at San Francisco with that little runt at quarterback, you can be in my top three for the week.

Obviously, the Ewing Theory is in full effect here. Next week's game against St. Louis will tell us a lot about both teams.

4. Atlanta (7-3-1) – It isn't last week's 41-0 destruction of Carolina that gets the Falcons up to number four on the list, but the fact that Michael Vick, and company haven't lost in seven games and the remainder of their schedule is the following: Minnesota, Tampa Bay, Seattle, Detroit and Cleveland. This team should definitely win 11 games.

And then lose in its first postseason game.

5. Green Bay (8-3) – The Packers have dropped their last two games, last week's to Tampa and the week before to a terrible Minnesota team. But they have the best quarterback on the planet and a strong running game and, probably with the help of Warren Sapp, turn this thing around.

Green Bay really has nothing to worry about, as they remain five games up in the NFC North with five to play.

Gimme pick of the week

St. Louis at Philadelphia – This one seems easy to me. There is no way that the Rams are going to lose next week in Philly, especially with Koy Detmer's injured arm. The Rams have to win out to make the playoffs at this point and have too much talent to drop their seventh game of the year with their backs against the wall. I'm willing to guess that the Rams will be an underdog in this one, so take the Rams and the points, because they are going to win straight-up anyway.

The race for Byron Leftwich, Maurice Clarett, or whoever else...

Cincinnati is running away with the award known as the No. 1 pick. It is likely that the Bengals would ruin quarterback Byron Leftwich's career by selecting him as the first overall pick in June's NFL Draft.

The Bungals were leading Pittsburgh 17-14 at the half, but the front office reminded the players which team they work for and, of course, they managed to blow the lead and the game to fall to 1-10.

Cincy was helped by the "Someone Has to Win" Bowl between the atrocious Detroit Lions and the scummy Chicago Bears. The Lions, who came into the game with three losses, tricked the Bears – who had just two losses – into trying for one offensive drive and pulled out the upset loss, 20-17 in overtime.

It was a stroke of genius for Detroit coach Marty Mornhinweg to take the wind after winning the coin toss in overtime, thereby giving the Bears the ball. I mean, even the Bears couldn't mess that one up. Mornhinweg later tried to cover up his blatant attempt to get Claretl by telling the press that he had full confidence in his defense up to that point – after they gave up 10 points to Chicago in the fourth quarter to even force overtime! What does he take us for, a bunch of morons? Obviously he was trying to give that one away. And now, both teams have three wins.

The expansion Houston Texans also earned their third win of the season with a 16-14 win over the Giants. Those two extra points came from, you guessed it, a safety. I guess being a new organization means that you can't even lose when you need to. This team obviously needs that first pick, but they can't even get that right.

So the Bengals are doing a great job, up two games for the No. 1 pick with just five weeks to go. Congratulations to Jon Kitna, Peter Warrick, Corey Dillon and everyone else who made this amazing run possible.

Bulger subpoenaed

COLLEGIAN

University of Massachusetts President William Bulger speaks at the Grand Opening of the new wing at the Isenberg School of Management in October. Bulger was subpoenaed to testify before a congressional panel after refusing an invitation to testify

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – University of Massachusetts president William Bulger will be subpoenaed to testify before a congressional panel about his fugitive brother after he refused an invitation to voluntarily appear.

James Wilson, head lawyer for the House Government Reform Committee, told the Associated Press on Saturday that Bulger's lawyer, Thomas Kiley, told him Bulger would not be at the hearing on Friday, as requested.

"Because Mr. Kiley was so emphatic in his message that Mr. Bulger will not appear, we started our process to issue a subpoena," Wilson said.

The committee, which is holding hearings Thursday and Friday in Boston, is investigating how the Boston FBI became corrupted during a decades-long practice of using mobsters as informants, including Bulger's brother, James "Whitey" Bulger.

James Bulger fled in 1995 just before he was indicted on racketeering and extortion charges. He has since been indicted on additional charges related to 18 murders, and is on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list.

William Bulger, former president of the state Senate, rarely discusses his relationship with his brother. Kiley refused to comment when reached Saturday.

The request for a subpoena will be sent to the clerk of the U.S. House to be certified Monday morning, Wilson said.

Wilson would not say what the panel will ask Bulger, who would risk imprisonment if he doesn't appear. Among the topics Bulger is expected to be questioned about is what, if any, influence he had with law enforcement while his brother was an informant.

Bulger is not the first witness to refuse to voluntarily testify. Former FBI agent Paul Rico was subpoenaed last year, and former U.S. Attorney Paul Markhant, was subpoenaed to testify Thursday.

Committee Chairman Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind., is holding the hearings to examine the Justice Department's overall handling of mob informants. The committee is investigating the relationship between Boston FBI agents and the hit men and mob leaders they used as informants and sometimes protected from prosecution for crimes as serious as murder.

Documents released to the committee indicated that FBI headquarters in Washington was aware of such relationships. Burton has since filed legislation to remove former FBI director J. Edgar Hoover's name from the FBI Building.

During the trial earlier this year of retired FBI agent John Connolly, confessed hitman Joseph Martorano testified William Bulger asked the FBI to protect his brother.

When Connolly asked William Bulger what he could do for him, Martorano testified, Bulger asked

Housing director considering dry dorm as option

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

Director of Housing Michael Gilbert said that he plans to look into establishing an alcohol- and drug-free building on campus by next fall.

Gilbert told the Springfield Union-News that he has accepted the recommendation of a campus study group and that he plans on looking into designating a campus residence hall as "dry."

The dry-dorm suggestion was developed by Chancellor John V. Lombardi's Task Force on the Prevention of Alcohol Abuse, a study developed by interim Chancellor Marcelette Williams last year.

The report had five recommendations for fighting alcohol abuse on campus, including continuation of the task force, a review of the existing alcohol-related policies, an evaluation of the way students enforce the underage drinking of other students and the establishment of the drug- and alcohol-free dorm.

The last recommendation was to not allow freshmen to join Greek life. According to the Union-News, Jo-Anne Vanin, interim vice chancellor for student affairs and campus life, has asked Gilbert to identify suitable buildings.

Gilbert's main concerns are that the hall is the right size for the project and that the dorm is in a suitable location. Gilbert is looking for a dorm that will have about 150 to 200 beds in it.

Placement of students into the dormitory would be on a volunteer basis in the same way that the four "wellness" floors on campus currently are.

Gilbert said that living in an alcohol-free area means that the students there commit to following a set of rules. Students are not moved unless problems arise.

According to the University website, residents in a wellness community "must agree not to use or possess alcohol or any other mood altering substances. Some students choose this option because they are committed to a holistic lifestyle. Others choose a wellness program due to a family history of chemical dependency or because they are in recovery."

The website also said that the program offers alcohol-free parties, vegan dinners, hiking trips and music nights. Educational activities on wellness floors often focus on topics related to sobriety and other health and wellness concerns.

Support services for the program are provided by University Health Services, Mental Health and the Residential Education Alcohol Program (REAP), which organizes formal interventions for students with substance abuse problems.

Senator Kerry takes first steps toward presidential run

By Ron Kampeas
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – Massachusetts Democrat John Kerry, a leading Senate liberal and decorated gunboat officer during the Vietnam War, said yesterday he is taking a first step toward running for president in 2004.

He took aim at President Bush's policies on taxes, education, Iraq and the Middle East, saying, "There is a better choice for this nation." Bush, asked Sunday night about the prospect of running against Kerry, smiled at reporters but said nothing.

Kerry, a 58-year-old former prosecutor first elected to the Senate in 1984, has said for the past year that he was seriously thinking about a run in 2004. He was unopposed for re-election in November to a fourth term — the first Massachusetts senator in 80 years with no major-party opposition.

"I'm going to file this week an exploratory committee, a formal committee, and I'm going to begin the process of organizing a national campaign," Kerry said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

An official announcement of his candidacy is months away, Kerry said.

Exploratory committees are established by budding candidates mainly to raise money, finance travels around the country and help gauge voter support.

"When you really get into the formal stage, which I am now entering, you find out who's prepared to be there, you see if you can raise the money," Kerry said. "It becomes real."

The best-known Democrat to emerge from Massachusetts is President John Kennedy — and Kerry did not shy from invoking his memory. But other Bay State Democrats have not fared as well in national elections.

Kennedy's brother, Sen. Edward Kennedy, failed in 1980 to win the presidential nomination, as did Paul Tsongas in 1992. Gov. Michael Dukakis — a Kerry mentor — won the 1988 nomination, but lost by a wide margin to Bush's father.

Democrats are expected to have a crowded field of candidates, with the party convention to be held in Boston.

Vermont Gov. Howard Dean already is running. Former Vice President Al Gore, the 2000 nominee, and North Carolina Sen. John Edwards expect to disclose their plans after the Christmas holidays.

Outgoing House Democratic leader Dick Gephardt of Missouri is expected to begin telling colleagues whether he plans to run. Also considering the race is Gore's running mate from two years ago, Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, who has said he would not run if Gore does.

A recent Los Angeles Times poll of Democratic National Committee members showed Gore and Kerry topped lists when people were asked their favorites.

During the NBC interview, Kerry repeatedly mentioned his service in Vietnam. He was an officer on a gunboat in the Mekong Delta and received numerous decorations for his combat experience, including a Silver Star and three Purple Heart awards. He later led demonstrations against the war after he returned home.

"I served in the armed services — I love this country," he said. "I have a great sense of what this country can be and what it is."

That background could deflect some of the criticism he could face for his voting record. He has voted with liberal standard bearer Kennedy 93 percent of the time.

Still, Kerry did not shy from those positions in making the announcement, restating his opposition to the death penalty and forcefully challenging

U.N. teams inspect airfield near Baghdad

By Charles J. Hanley
Associated Press

KHAN BANI SA'AD, Iraq (AP) – U.N. disarmament teams inspected a shabby, seldom-used airfield in corn country north of Baghdad on Sunday, a place where Iraqi experts engineered devices for bombarding an enemy from the air with sprays of killer microbes.

The U.N. inspectors checked on equipment sealed and tagged by U.N. teams in the 1990s, and pored over paper and computer files, the airfield's director said. But they apparently found none of the advanced spray systems, unaccounted for since the Gulf War.

"We showed them everything," said the director, Montadhar Radeef Mohammed.

The inspectors, as usual, kept their findings confidential, pending later formal reports.

In their first week of inspections, the U.N. monitors paid unannounced visits to a dozen Iraqi sites with a wide variety of specialties and links to weapons programs in the 1980s.

Those ranged from an animal vaccine plant that brewed lethal toxins for bombs, to an industrial complex planned to house hundreds of gas centrifuges producing enriched uranium for Iraqi nuclear weapons.

In both those cases, and dozens of others, the earlier inspectors destroyed the critical equipment, and put other gear under seal, video surveillance or other forms of control. They also destroyed many tons of chemical and biological agents for weapons.

That inspection regime collapsed in 1998, however, as the Baghdad government and U.N. officials clashed over access to Iraqi sites and the alleged presence of U.S. spies in the U.N. operation. Those inspectors believed they never found all of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.

The inspections have resumed under a U.N. Security Council mandate for Iraq, 11 years after its Gulf War defeat, to finally give up any remaining chemical, biological or nuclear weapons programs, or face "serious consequences." The United States threatens war against Iraq, with or without U.N. support, if the new inspections don't strip Baghdad of such weapons.

him to "just keep my brother out of trouble."

Bulger has denied that claim. He has publicly discussed his brother on only a handful of occasions, including a few paragraphs in his autobiography.

Burton has already investigated revelations that Joseph Salvati of Boston spent 30 years in prison for the murder of Edward "Teddy" Deegan, even though the FBI had evidence of his innocence.

In the upcoming hearings, Burton is expected to look at the case of Roger Wheeler, the president of World Jai Alai who was gunned down in 1981 in Oklahoma after Bulger learned he suspected Bulger's gang of skimming profits from his company.

Two of Wheeler's sons are also scheduled to testify Thursday.

On Monday, the committee will release a deposition by Dennis Condon, a former FBI agent who cultivated another of Bulger's associates, Joseph "The Animal" Barboza.

FBI memos indicated that Barboza, who later became a star witness in three Mafia trials, was one of Deegan's killers. A jury convicted six men for killing Deegan – Salvati among them – in part based on Barboza's testimony.

Bush's proposed tax cuts.

"We can't go on any longer pretending to Americans that you can have everything and that nobody has to have any cost attached to it," he said.

"What Sept. 11 taught us, or reminded us perhaps, is that there are some things that only the government will do ... It's your traffic jam, it's your school that's falling apart, it's your airport system that doesn't work, it's your security system that isn't there."

Kerry has been drawing differences with Bush in the areas of energy and foreign policy in appearances around the country. He plans to lay out his economic plan in a policy speech Tuesday in Cleveland, including focusing tax cuts more on the middle class.

Republican arguments that rescinding promised tax cuts amounts to an increase are "silly," Kerry said. "No average American believes that's an increase."

Kerry said he favors a tax cut that "comes in a payroll tax reduction that will put more money in the pocket of the middle class and average worker." A payroll tax refundable credit would leave Social Security untouched, he said.

He also rejected Bush proposals on school vouchers, and scored the administration's education policies as regressive, saying he would spend more money on public schools.

"There aren't enough seats at the table of charter schools," he said. "We have a new problem in America, it's called separate and unequal .... And you don't have a prayer in many communities of providing equality of education unless you have equality of resources."

Kerry said he would back war with Iraq only if Bush could prove an imminent threat, and said he viewed unilateralism as dangerous. "The United States of America should not go to war because it wants to go to war. We should go to war because we have to go to war."

He also said the administration had abandoned the role of honest broker between Israel and the Palestinians.

"They gave the green light, if you will, to the most negative instincts of that region to begin to take hold," he said, adding that he would remind Israel that it would eventually have to stop settlement building.

Kerry said his wife, Teresa Heinz, fully backed his campaign, although she has publicly expressed reservations in the past.

Kerry has more than $3 million in his Senate election committee that can be rolled into a presidential effort, associates said.

In the past, Kerry and his wife, heir to the Heinz ketchup fortune, have decided against using their own money, which totals in the hundreds of millions of dollars, for campaigns. He did not discuss campaign financing during the televised interview.

Kerry does not take money from political action committees representing corporations, labor unions and interest groups.

Silence doesn't help

Bulger should testify

A congressional committee has filed a request to the clerk of the U.S. House this morning to subpoena University of Massachusetts President William M. Bulger. The committee wants Bulger to testify about his brother James "Whitey" Bulger.

"Whitey" Bulger was a longtime FBI informant and mob leader in Boston. He is on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted List and has been on the run from racketeering and murder charges for almost eight years. If the request is approved, President Bulger may be forced to appear at a U.S. House Government Reform committee hearing in Boston on Dec. 6.

According to a released statement from the committee, Bulger "is expected to testify about the relationship between federal law enforcement and his brother, James Bulger."

The committee would most likely ask a series of questions including whether William Bulger asked the FBI to protect his brother, if he participated in the partnership between the FBI and Whitey Bulger, and if William has had any contact with Whitey since he has been on the run. It is part of a two-year congressional hearing on the FBI's handling of informants in Boston over the past 30 years.

A Boston Globe source said the panel originally invited Bulger to testify on Dec. 5 along with several other witnesses, including former New England Organized Crime Strike Force Chief Jeremiah O'Sullivan.

Bulger's lawyer, Thomas Kiley told the committee that Bulger had a scheduling conflict and would not appear voluntarily at any time. The panel then extended the invitation for him to testify the day after.

Since Bulger has indicated that he will not show up voluntarily, the committee felt they had no choice but to officially subpoena him. Now, if Bulger decides not to appear, he could by held in contempt of Congress and could be subject to criminal penalties.

Our question to President Bulger is: What do you have to hide?

Refusing to testify automatically shows some sort of guilt. If he ignores the subpoena, Bulger would also be openly breaking the law. Bulger, a former state senate president, would be ignoring the laws he once swore to uphold and protect as a politician.

The connection between Whitey Bulger and University president William Bulger is well known in New England, but not throughout the country. His title, as our university system President, will certainly leave a mark on the reputation of our institution. Bulger's refusal to testify voluntarily already sends a strong message that he not only has something to hide, but that he's trying to obstruct justice in this case. Another Bulger brother, John, a former clerk in Boston juvenile court is currently awaiting trial. John was indicted last November for lying to a grand jury about his contact with Whitey and obstructing efforts to find him.

The family connections in this are clearly suspicious, and Bulger's refusal to testify only makes him look worse. Bulger should obey the law and testify. If he has nothing to hide, then there shouldn't be a problem. Right?

Post-Thanksgiving thoughts

[illegible] you're all safe and sound [illegible] at UMass recovering from your [illegible] the gluttons and excursions to [illegible] Bars. And before you were [illegible] from your tryptophan-[illegible] slumber by your fat Uncle [illegible], I know you were dreaming [illegible] reading a copy of the Collegian and seeing my goofy face smiling awkwardly back at you. So for your amusement, here are some my collected musings from the all-too-short break.

What's the definition of "Dress" Someone who [illegible] dresses like an American with multi-colored vomit, and a [illegible] drunken explanation of, "Oh, it happens."

That [illegible] certainly goes on the all-time [illegible] blooper reel, as my [illegible] was on display for all my family to see. After my buddy Mike [illegible] "welcome home" shots, [illegible] and the home-slowly [illegible] laughter erupt. When we [illegible] from home, I leapt out of the [illegible] ready, and dove face first [illegible] now occupying my room. [illegible] I'd forgotten to take off [illegible] pants. Miraculously [illegible] those patches of pale, curled [illegible] weren't there, and I hadn't ruined [illegible] always a silver lining.

[illegible] a big plate of my [illegible] booze fest have to do [illegible] Sunday night. I just thought I [illegible] a laugh at my expense.

[illegible] Hollis-ton Panthers [illegible] 17 section to the arrival [illegible] Panthers in what was an [illegible] for both teams [illegible] with the loss, while [illegible] improved to 5-6. This game [illegible] Valley League [illegible] Tri-Valley League.

[illegible] ros buddy Tim invited me [illegible] back to ball game with a [illegible] from Medway, the neighboring [illegible] accepted, because it [illegible] a good idea. Right from the [illegible] I felt like I was playing on [illegible] I forgotten my clear-[illegible] to make cuts on the simultaneously [illegible] middle field at Medway [illegible] I went through most of the first [illegible] of second tenure at quarterback. I [illegible] my receptions and was sacked [illegible] because the offensive line blocked [illegible] the pavement a few years ago.

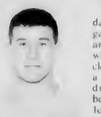
[illegible] so realized that I'm not Brett [illegible]. I only took the helm and the [illegible] could nothing. We won 45-45, [illegible] passing one touchdown, one [illegible] and one fumble recovery.

After the game, I surveyed the mud on my clothes, and realized that yes, I'd worn my only pair of good sneakers. So we'll just throw that into the Sean Jacquet idiot file.

Speaking of mediocre performances at quarterback, let's talk about Tom Brady and the Detroit Lions' Joey Harrington. It's hard enough to stay awake with a bellyful of turkey without watching this Thanksgiving snoozer. Granted, the Pats emerged with a 20-12 win, but they seemed to be hosting a clinic on "How to Almost Lose to One of the Sorriest Franchises in the NFL." Thanks to Harrington's three interceptions and his inability to get his team into the end zone, our boys escaped with a win over the hapless Lions. The Lions had to settle for four field goals in the loss, which dropped them to 3-9.

When did Christina Aguilera flip the whore switch? In the new copy of Blender she's all-skanked out, appearing in a couple of topless pictures with her hands covering her breasts. Wasn't this the girl who sang "Genie In a Bottle?" Wasn't she an All-American sweetheart? She claims her new risqué image is meant to reverse her teen pop image.

Now, I have no problem with a strong, independent woman asserting her sexuality. In fact, I find nothing sexier. But is it necessary to go to these lengths to build a new persona? It would appear the road to pop stardom goes through Hookerville. There's nothing wrong with asserting your sexuality. There's nothing wrong with revealing pictures. But when these types of pictures overshadow the music, or even worse, become the basis for fame, there's something wrong. Rock stars should be appreciated for their songwriting and musicianship, not how they look in a bikini.



The other night, I emerged from the bathroom to a chorus of giggles. A friend of mine informed me that I'd neglected to zip up my zipper. I looked down, saw that he was right, and zipped up, feeling embarrassed that about 10 people would have seen my junk if not for a thin sheet of cotton. My face turned red, but I found comfort in the words of a wise man: "It's better to forget to zip up than forget to unzip in the first place."

So concludes my tales of Thanksgiving shame and embarrassment. If nothing else, I hope you can find a little humor at my expense.

SEAN JACQUET

Choking on tofu burgers

CAREY

Thanksgiving is a holiday when we come and gather with our family and friends to a table with a nice, white linen cloth that's flushed with a variety of food and drink. But before we begin, we all sit and wait for the main entree to be placed on the table. When it is, we openly gorge ourselves like antediluvian cavemen; cutting and tearing at the bones and ligaments of one of the stupidest looking creatures God ever created. Unlike other rituals widely practiced by our culture, I too proudly sit down with my clan and take part in this savage dance.

This year, in the midst of pulling off one of the legs from this fat 25-pound bird, I caught a scowling glance out of the corner of my eye. It belonged to an extended relative of mine, who is a proud and outspoken vegan. She sat at the end of the table, with her thin emaciated arms folded, looking at the proceedings with disgust. Her pallid complexion in her cheeks turned slightly red. And after crunching down a few celery sticks and other assorted grains on her plate she began her mind numbing rhetoric.

That night, I came home and flipped on TV. Conan O'Brien had a guest; she was some blonde female Canadian actress in her late 20s regaling the crowd with this story about how she and her boyfriend accidentally burning the tofu turkey they bought exclusively for the holidays. Then she proudly went into the same vegan rant that I heard earlier that night at the dinner table before preceding to entertain the crowd with another story about her meatless experiences. Apparently, one day after falling on her face and making an ass out of herself because her foot had fallen asleep, the doctors thought that she had a hairline fracture in her leg.

However, it turns out that this hairline fracture was really a growth plate that hadn't sealed yet. This was an enigma to the doctors, because normal women complete their growing at the age of 18; however, when the blonde actress explained to her doctor that she was a vegan the mystery was solved.

"And despite what they tell you, tofu is no substitute."

Don't get me wrong, I don't hate vegans. I have friends who are vegans. And while most of them will be displeased to read this article, I doubt their protein-deficient minds, and energy drained composure will be up to challenging me to an actual debate. Generally, all my herbivorous friends talk about is being sick, being tired, being weak, and how great it is to be a vegan. "You know Kurt Cobain was a vegan," they say. Well there's someone's dietary regiment I'd like to emulate. They also tell me "Well so is Alicia Silverstone, and almost everyone else in Hollywood. They say it's wrong to eat animals because so many resources are lost in preparing them."

No it's not, by eating herbivorous animals I'm able to go about my day without spending copious hours eating beans and rice, in order to keep myself awake. Meat and other high-protein food is a necessary commodity in this work-a-day world we live in. And despite what they tell you, tofu is no substitute. I don't know exactly what tofu is, but I do know it is a vile, flavorless, soy-based mush that was probably the accidental byproduct of a biochem lab trying to make cheaper insulation for housing.

So what's the logic behind becoming vegan? I've heard it all. "Eating meat makes me feel sick." If so, perhaps a visit to the doctor is in order. Generally evolution tends not to favor stomachs that can't digest protein without feeling queasy, and so maybe that's a sign that something is wrong and should be checked out. "The meat packing industry is evil." Granted, but so is every other industry, are you going to stop wearing clothes because they were woven in a sweatshop? And then, of course, there was the one my cousin gave at the dinner table this Thanksgiving, "I don't like the idea of eating something that used to be alive and walking around." To which I responded, "You know you better take it easy on that salad dressing, there is animal fat in there. And you know that Oreo cookie you had before dinner, there was animal fat in that too."

I am aware that in America the majority of us, who aren't vegans, may take our love of consuming other animals a little overboard. This being so, perhaps it's wise that I chastise meat gluttony as equally as I do vegans. But vegans get under my skin more, because most believe that by being a vegan they're more enlightened than the rest of us. That in some way they're more sensitive and in tune with the rest of the world around them, because they've cut one of the four basic food groups from their lives.

Behind sticky doors lie secret companies

NOONE

This weekend, I looked forward to finding a decent job for our seemingly eternal winter break. Since I lifeguard every summer, it is difficult to return to any of my jobs in the cold winter months of December and January.

Having attempted to find food service and sales jobs in the past with no success (who wants to bother hiring and training a college student in a period of five weeks?) I noticed an ad in my hometown paper that advertised the following job: "WINTER BREAK WORK: $15.50 base appt." All of us at UMass have seen similar posters around school. "Campaign jobs for the Environment" (i.e. door-to-door fundraising) and "Inventory Work" (i.e. counting widgets eight hours a day). Despite being skeptical and uneasy, I decided to call and find out what this job was actually about.

A pleasant young woman answered when I called and was very nice, almost too nice. She began asking me personal questions such as where I went to school, what my full name was, my phone number. All before I could even ask any questions. Next, the receptionist told me that because I was going back to school Monday morning, she could "squeeze me in" for an interview at 12:30 Saturday, even though they had been getting "lots and lots of applications." When I attempted to ask exactly what company, product, or job description was involved, she hurriedly informed me that she was just the receptionist and I should keep my interview appointment to find out those answers. Although the entire operation seemed sketchy, I figured it was a smart idea to take that Saturday afternoon off from further Christmas shopping and attempt to find winter employment.

Dressed nicely in my new tweed pants, I walked up a shaky set of stairs in the back of a restaurant to the, let's call it, Acme Company office. I turned the knob and the sticky door hastily opened, bringing me into a room of 15 other college-age students and a sickeningly smiley greeter. The office was dirty and unkempt, decorated by mismatched folding chairs, an ugly oversized desk, and crinkled posters advertising exceptional sales records. The girl at the door gave me an application, introduced herself and smiled so hard that I thought her face would freeze that way.

"The manager called us over to surround her large desk and was annoyingly peppy, friendly, and, in the tradition of car salesmen, very 'bada-bing, bada-boom.'"

By this time, it was clear that the company had also "squeezed in" all these other people at 12:30 for a large, generic group interview. The manager, after speaking with each of us individually, made a decision whether or not she wanted us to stay for the group interview and job explanation. All of the college-age students were asked to stay, while several older adults were not. The manager called us over to surround her large desk and was annoyingly peppy, friendly, and, in the tradition of car salesmen, very "bada-bing, bada-boom." She encouraged us to talk to one another, be part of a team (i.e. get ready for the fake smiles and giddy product endorsement that we would be performing if offered the job). She instantly agitated me, lecturing us on eye contact and proper behavior, staring us down to make sure we looked back, and calling us each by name in this horribly fake way that made it seem like we had been best friends since kindergarten. Ick.

Following a brief introduction to the company, all of the interviewees were (finally!) let in on what we would actually be doing: selling knives. With no easy escape route, I was forced to suffer through not one, but three demonstrations of how these "amazing knives spoke for themselves" in the way that they could cut pennies in half, slice cleanly through leather, and split a rope in one stroke. Nifty. I was beginning to feel like I had involuntarily become part of a really bad infomercial in which the starry-eyed audience is bombarded with appliances that will supposedly make their kitchens superior and their lives better. I was expecting Tony Little to burst through the door and start jumping around the room, cutting everything in sight with the knives, or to see muscular women working out on the Gazelle for a TV commercial in the office next door.

The repetitious praising of the knives, along with the typical salesmen attitude, made me ill at ease. I kept thinking how I had no intention of selling my soul to the knife gods just to make some money over break. My friend Chris has told me repeatedly how the years he sold printing products were the worst years of his life and that he would never return to such conniving business methods.

After two excruciating hours of listening to this mindless propaganda, the manager told me that she was "going to hold off" on offering me a position because I seemed "nervous." I wanted to inform her that nervous wasn't a synonym for skeptical, but decided to leave gracefully. She obviously wanted the flouzy college students who laughed and seemed amazed throughout the presentation, smiled at her in that oh-so-loving way, and would treat Acme Knife Company as a personal friend. As for me, I do not ever want to be a part of a secretive, sneaky company. I think it's a shame that so many students, as I saw firsthand this weekend, are more concerned with profit making, business skills, and phony personal communication than they are about being up front, honest, and genuine. I felt complimented when rejected from Acme Knife Company. While Acme Knife salespeople may have difficulty finding potential knife customers to open their doors for them, it is reassuring to know that my questioning mind will open many doors for me.

HOWEVER, THE EMPEROR'S CLUB FAILS TO MAKE THE GRADE

"This is a story without surprises."

Movies, as a general rule, shouldn't describe themselves so succinctly in their dialogue. It takes all the fun out of being a movie critic. Yet The Emperor's Club, a stodgy, tweed-jacket prep school drama that could have been called Dead Poets Society: The Next Generation, manages to single out its biggest flaw in just six short words.

Generic may not be the best word to describe the been there, studied that, feeling I had watching the movie; no, I'd better describe it as vapid, high-end pabulum that goes down like the chalkiest of antacid medicines.

The Emperor's Club is one of those bogus inspirational hackjobs that appears to be cobbled together from bits and pieces of better films. The movies being plundered this time are from the time-honored tradition of the in-spiring teacher story. The movie's some sort of blandly synthesized hodgepodge of Mr. Holland's Opus, The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie, Goodbye Mr. Chips, Dead Poet's Society, and about a dozen other like-minded tales of ennobled teachers forever touching the lives of their young charges. I, for one, wasn't exactly stirred and uplifted; instead, I felt as though I spent an entire day in detention.

The Wallflowers' Red Letter Days passes with flying colors

By Johnny Donaldson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

THE WALLFLOWERS
Red Letter Days
Interscope

Bitter-sweetness runs through Red Letter Days, the newest work form the Wallflowers, the band that happens to be led by Jakob Dylan, son of Bob Dylan. The Wallflowers have had enough success – especially with their 1996 best-seller Bringing Down The Horse, which spawned the massive hit "One Headlight" – to warrant a stroll away from the shadow of Jakob's paterfamilias. Red Letter Days is a solid, sometimes sublime, work that allows the band to have a tighter focus in spite of the looming cover of Bob.

"When You're On Top," the chirpy lead single, sounds a lot like a car commercial (Mitsubishi should employ the chorus in a spot) and sounds thin and inconsequential in the process. The rest of the album is heartier stock. Emotions coil and spring throughout Red Letter Days and alternating currents of sadness and sweetness snake through Dylan's hoarse rasp.

"We'll make a lover out of you yet" Dylan coos to a potential flame on "How Good It Can Get," but later on he acidly decrees "I wish you health/ I wish you happiness/ but absolutely nothing else" to an ex on "Health and Happiness." Dylan then turns the song right around on turns to the song into a kind of peaceful farewell; the chorus turns from a venomous snap into a kind of diplomatic, elegant adios to a former lover.

Dylan and his bandmates – Rami Jaffe on keyboards, Greg Richling on bass, and Mario Calire on drums – with Pearl Jam's Mike McCready making five guest appearances – accentuate their perfectly orchestrated pop with the thrum and throb of the heart. The sentiments in "If You Never Get Sick" sound morbid at first, but take on greater significance on second thought ("Baby, if you never get sick/ I wouldn't get to hold you"). Dylan gets carefree on "Feels Like Summer Again"; he whispers sweet nothings on "Closer To You." He tells a woman that he doesn't need anybody to help him up on the chiming "Everything I Need." On "See You When I Get There" Dylan chants "I ain't sorry baby/ don't think that we ain't done anything/ I'd take back," it's his address to a flame that they should have no regrets about their relationship.

It's not all flower petals and heartaches on Red Letter Days. The throbbing roar of "Everybody Out of the Water" is Dylan's response to 9/11 with Dylan singing, "the city's been leveled/ hills are in flames." He's caught between inspiration and disaffection on "Too Late To Quit."

The music is much better developed than most pop on the radio nowadays. The pounding "Too Late To Quit," the unsyncopated "If You Never Got Sick," the bopping chug of "See You When I Get There" and the brooding bump of "Health and Happiness" are perfectly crafted guitar-pop. In fact, except for the execrable cheeriness of "When You're On Top," Red Letter Days proves to be quite excellent. Red Letter Days is actually superior to the roots-pop framework of Bringing Down The Horse, which still felt like a template for the band (even though they were four years old at that point). Solid craftsmanship such as this takes them beyond the shadows of both Jakob's father and multi-platinum success (their last album, Breach, went platinum). On Red Letter Days, the Wallflowers become the Honeco ming Kings.

Episode VI: Chivalry is not dead... kind of

By Melissa Hammel & Lizzy Nielsen

The ladies from "Running with Scissors" are back this week after an extreme stress break to bring you our take on the topic of chivalry. Despite popular belief, chivalry is not dead, nor should it be. With the sexes' ills in movement, chivalry isn't as prominent as it used to be, but there's still a large female population that appreciates it. Guys, if you are lacking in the manners department, here are a few tips to bring chivalry back into your lives. Open the door. This one is simple and obvious. Spanning from hallways to restaurants, open up doors for the women behind you. It is polite show good manners and it is also something that is often forgotten. It only takes a second and it is guaranteed to impress. Also don't limit opening the door for females; you are interested in, try to do it for everyone. Opening up the passenger car door for the other passenger is also a nice touch. The ladies of "Running with Scissors" have a friend that does this all of the time for his passengers and the move is always appreciated as polite and thoughtful.

PULL OUT CHAIRS

This is another obvious act of chivalry that can turn a mediocre date into a great one. It shows good manners, and runs hand in hand with opening doors – as such. The women of Running with Scissors think the simplicity of this gesture can speak loudly of a man's character. It's a great way to subtly be a gentleman without going completely overboard.

OFFER HER YOUR COAT

As women, there is nothing better than when you're cold being offered a man's jacket. It's like being given a gigantic hug without any kind of physical contact. Even if a woman isn't saying she's cold, offer your jacket, especially if it is chilly out. It's just nice. And there's no possible way for it to not go over well.

fire his agent for handing him such insipid material, does wonders by at least playing his role with dignity, grace and elegance. He stars as William Hundert, a beloved classics teacher at posh private boys school St. Benedictus Academy, one of those private academies where the buildings are giant stone edifices and the lawns are perfectly emerald.

Hundert uses ancient Greek and Roman literature to mold his students into the kind of men who become senators and heads and business, and does so keeping an eye out for their moral development. In 1476, he's challenged by the arrival of Sedgewick Bell (Emile Hirsch), the promising newcomer from Hie Dangerous Tires of Vinyl Roof, the petulant, rebellious son of a corrupt senator.

Sedgewick is the kind of charismatic, handsome hellraiser who keeps cigarettes and nudie magazines in his trunk, goes skinny dipping with the girls from the academy across the lake, and treats Hundert's gestalts with disdain.

Every year at St. Benedictus, Hundert terminates an academic contest in which he has these students compete by answering increasingly harder questions about the classics. The meat of the drama comes when Sedgewick attempts to be eligible for competition and Hundert's shaving of ethical gerbets to reward the boys progress along with its ramifications 25 years later.

That's certainly a potentially compelling schtick to the material. None of the other movies about these stimulating subjects ever presented their subjects as likeable human beings who are willing to go down the dark road if it benefits their students. But even Hundert's ostensible cheating is gambled by the fact that he wants to help this obviously troubled kid. There are no hard questions being asked here, no moral lessons being learned that haven't already been taught on Saturday morning television. The movie is noble to the point of piousness. I felt like the movie should have been bronzed and placed in a city park as a statue.

KEVIN KLINE IS BACK WITH HIS LATEST RELEASE THE EMPEROR'S CLUB, WHICH SADLY LOST BATTLES AS A SECOND BAT.

The movie is altogether boring. Director Michael Hoffman bathes everything in buttery light, as if a ray from God was coming down to alight on Hundert. Neil Tolkin's script (based on Ethan Canin's short story "The Palace Thief") is a compendium of lifeless banalities stapled together out of platitudes and life-affirming messages. No one really talks in this movie; they just exchange Sunday school lessons with each other. It's like being stuck in an everlasting catechism. The Emperor's Club wants to pull on the heart strings so badly that it results in a heart attack. C+ (Universal rated PG-13 for some sexual content. 106 mins.)

insouciant can be just as sexy as sledging at it can other just enough flippance when you end up getting a kiss. Again, there's no greater way to get a woman's attention than through her nose. It doesn't matter what a man is wearing if clothing-wise as long as he smells nice.

LET THE OTHER PERSON ORDER FIRST

While we are on the topic of eating, there is nothing worse than blurting out your order the minute that the waiter or waitress even orbits near your table.

Not only do you leave your eating partner confused as you scream out "I want a cheeseburger" several octaves above your normal voice, but you are also killing chivalry with a shovel.

This is not a game show, you do not get extra points for ordering more quickly than the other person. So therefore it is better to take turns and let the other person go first.

SMALL SPEAKS BIG

Placing your hand on the small of a woman's back is a great way to escort someone around on a date without being forward and grasping for her hand. If there is too much of a height discrepancy and an arm around the shoulders won't work or the confidence isn't quite there for a reach for her hand, placing a hand on the small of a woman's back as she's walking next to you or as she is going ahead through a door being held open for her is a great and subtle way to show a chivalrous side.

DON'T TRY TOO HARD

Chivalry is all about being subtle. While it is nice to pull out chairs and open doors, it is not necessary to destroy your brand new leather coat by throwing it over a puddle so that your companion can step on it. True chivalry is something that is just a part of everyday life. Just acting as though you have manners, saying please and thank you, and treating the other person with respect is usually plenty when it comes to both chivalry and politeness.

Hopefully these words of wisdom can add to the male repertoire of dating behavior. And perhaps even improve the day-to-day life at UMass, making it a more pleasant place to exist. This is, of course, what we strive to do. As always, call us shallow, but don't deny it, we're right.

Make Every Girl ranks as a degrading approach to dating

By Johnny Donaldson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

MAKE EVERY GIRL WANT YOU: HOW TO HAVE SEX WITH HOT GIRLS (WITHOUT EVEN DATING THEM!)
John Fate and Steve Reil
Axion Publishing

Are there really people out there who actually buy how-to guides on dating? In my head, I have to say they exist, because these books proliferate like bunny rabbits. Yet, in my heart I tend to believe that publishing houses foolishly put out these books just to see if they can lure desperate lonely people into shelling out 15 bucks for advice they can get for free from their families.

If I was perusing the shelves of my local bookstore, I wouldn't exactly feel comfortable plopping a book entitled Make Every Girl Want You: How to Have Sex with Hot Girls (without having to date them!) in front of the clerk. Never mind that the title is a mouthful. It's just that the title is, well, the title. Beyond screaming the fact that you are a lonely, socially incapable twit with no skill in attracting ladies, it also pretty much telegraphs your desire to be a player. It basically says that you are a near-virgin who wants to be a man-whore when you grow up. A dating guide on how to get women in bed is pretty much antithetical to itself; once women find out you have used said guide, they will see you as a pathetic loser who needs a dating guide to attract women.

According to the little blurb on the back cover, the authors, John Fate and Steve Reil, are "normal guys who have sex a lot." In the book and in the press material, they admit their own past sexual histories were not very illustrious. Between the two, they had a combined five successful conquests. They also had a friend named Oscar, who had seemingly eternal luck with the ladies. Oscar became scientific study for Fate and Reil, who watched every move he made, listened to every word he said and then began to apply his suave techniques to themselves.

They developed a process that they called CCR, which is the acronym for the three major tenets of their lessons. CCR stands for Compliments, Confidence and Respect. For Fate and Reil, gaining the confidence of women involves paying them compliments, treating them as friends, showing respect and compassion for the ladies. Which raises the question: shouldn't these things have been in place to begin with? Why do you need a how-to guide to teach you how to treat women like ladies?

> "I hate to spoil it for wannabe CCR men, but acting like the kind of no-personality dishrag that only sits there to listen will have women (and men) walking over you in an instant."

Fate and Reil instruct their soon-to-be "Men of CCR" to be friends first with ladies, and then the sex will come. You must genuinely listen to a woman when she is speaking, maintaining eye contact (though not creepily so), and comforting her when she's down – basically being the shoulder to cry on, the sounding board to her problems. (Um, guys your mother never taught you that women like to be listened to?) They say that you must build a network of female friends, a delicate lattice of interlocking relationships wherein no one person gets more attention than another. They say you never complain about your own problems and never bring up issues that could prove contrary to the girls' beliefs (even when it comes to something as innocent and trivial as movies or pets.) They say...wait a minute, never complain or state your own beliefs? Yeah, they're pretty much saying you must act like a simp to attract girls.

I'm a nice guy. I have always played the nice guy ticket. I have never wanted to be the rebellious, bad boy. In fact, some of the teachings of CCR were already in my own repertoire. But to never complain or state my opinion? I'm not a doormat. I'm not about to be one. Yet Fate and Reil are teaching that being a doormat is the best way to attract girls. It's not. I hate to spoil it for wannabe CCR men, but acting like the kind of no-personality dishrag that only sits there to listen will have women (and men) walking over you in an instant. If I don't like a movie, I'll say it (and not just because I'm a movie critic.) If I'm having a bad day, I have the right to vent a little. As long as I am not acting like a jackass, I think I would be fine. So Fate and Reil are giving dubious – maybe even pernicious – advice.

Fate and Reil also give their advice in general terms. By that I mean they are pretty much saying that all girls are alike. This is not true. Some girls may fall for the boys' CCR techniques, but that doesn't mean all girls will. Every human being is different, and there are different factors for each person in the quest for romance or, at the very least, sexual gratification. Following the advice of one book isn't likely to get you anywhere.

Anyway, there is one good thing that can be said about the book – it's a fast read. I read it in one sitting, which means I only had to put up with it for one night.

Inaugural NFC North division title goes to Packers

GREEN BAY, Wis. (AP) – The Green Bay Packers clinched their first NFC North title in five years by forcing five turnovers and getting an outstanding performance by rookie running back Tony Fisher to beat Chicago 30-20 Sunday.

Fisher, an undrafted free agent from Notre Dame, replaced Ahman Green, who hurt his left knee in the third quarter. Fisher had 91 yards and a touchdown on 17 carries.

On a cold, windy day at Lambeau Field, Brett Favre threw two second-half touchdown passes and improved to 33-0 at home when the temperature is 34 or below. He beat the Bears for the 18th time in 22 tries.

The Packers (9-3) trailed 14-6 at halftime and appeared on their way to a third straight loss until Rod Walker forced a fumble by Bears center Olin Kreutz at the Green Bay 1 early in the third quarter.

The play appeared to be a fumble by quarterback Jim Miller, but Walker timed the snap perfectly, grabbed the ball and pulled it back to his chest, covering up all in one fluid motion.

The Packers also got a huge play from receiver Javon Walker, who ran about 100 yards to chase down Roosevelt Williams as he was about to dance into the end zone at the end of the first half.

Damon Moore had intercepted Favre's pass at the Chicago 5 but fumbled at midfield. Packers lineman Mike Flanagan recovered but tossed the ball into the air. Williams grabbed it and started running before Walker caught him.

The Bears (3-9) lost starting running back Anthony Thomas with a broken right index finger. Tight end Dustin Lyman scored his first two career TDs.

Falcons 30, Vikings 24, OT

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) – Michael Vick ran for 173 yards – the most by a quarterback since the NFL-AFL merger in 1970 – and scored the winning touchdown in overtime from 46 yards out as the Falcons stayed unbeaten in their last eight games.

The previous high by a QB was 127 yards, set by the Chicago's Bobby Douglass against Oakland on Dec. 17, 1972.

The Falcons (8-3-1) are 7-0-1 since a home loss to Tampa Bay on Oct. 6.

Vick was just 11-for-28 for 173 yards passing with a touchdown, an interception and two fumbles. But on the Falcons' second offensive play of overtime, Vick dropped back, rolled left and broke two tackles on his way to the end zone.

Bills 38, Dolphins 21

ORCHARD PARK, N.Y. (AP) – Drew Bledsoe overcame the elements, and the Buffalo Bills overcame Ricky Williams' career-high 228 yards rushing.

Bledsoe threw three touchdown passes and scored on a 2-yard run as the Bills rallied from a 14-5 first-quarter deficit.

Braving snow, a cold wind and a slick field, Bledsoe finished 15-for-27 for 306 yards, directing three straight TD drives in the second half.

The Bills (6-6) ended a three-game losing streak while jumping back into the AFC East playoff race, getting within a game of the Dolphins (7-5). Miami also lost ground, falling into a tie with the New England Patriots.

The Dolphins, who lost quarterback Ray Lucas to a nerve injury, couldn't be carried by Williams, who scored on runs of 45 and 35 yards.

His rushing total set a team single-game record, and his 1,284 yards is a new franchise mark, surpassing the 1,258 by Delvin Williams in 1978. It also was the second-most yardage ever for a losing team.

Steelers 25, Jaguars 23

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. (AP) – Kordell Stewart made a bid to get his job back for good, Jeff Reed made all six of his field-goal attempts and the Steelers' defense closed the door on the Jaguars.

Reed, a rookie signed two weeks ago to replace the injured Todd Peterson, kicked a 50-yarder to give Pittsburgh (7-4-1) a 25-17 lead with 4:30 left.

Mark Brunell and the Jags (5-7) answered with a 65-yard TD drive to cut the deficit to two with 1:16 left. But the Steelers' defense stopped Jacksonville on the 2-point try when Dewayne Washington broke up the pass Brunell threw into quadruple coverage trying to hit Jimmy Smith.

Chiefs 49, Cardinals 0

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) – Despite a defense ranked last in the league, the Kansas City Chiefs shut out the injury-weakened Cardinals, handing Arizona its worst loss in memory.

The Cardinals' previous worst loss was on Oct. 12, 1941, when the Chicago Cardinals lost to the Chicago Bears 53-7. Records aren't available between 1898, when the Cardinals were founded, and 1920.

It also was the biggest margin in the NFL since the Cincinnati Bengals beat the Houston Oilers 61-7 on Dec. 17, 1989.

Dante Hall added a team-record 90-yard punt return for a touchdown for the Chiefs (6-6), who sent the Cardinals (4-8) to their sixth straight loss.

Titans 32, Giants 29, OT

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. (AP) – After sitting out all week because of rib, shin and toe injuries, Steve McNair threw three touchdown passes, ran for a game-tying 2-point conversion and set up Joe Nedney's 38-yard field goal in overtime.

McNair, who didn't know until game time whether he was going to play, was 30-of-43 for 334 yards.

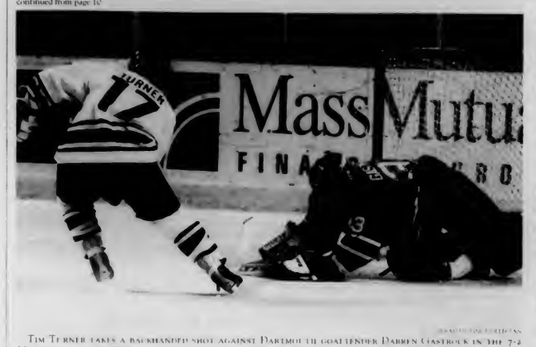
The Titans (7-5) have won six of seven and are in the thick of the playoff chase, while the Giants (6-6) have lost two in a row.

The Giants had their chances to put the Titans away late in the fourth quarter when they got a first-and-goal from Tennessee's 1. But they lost a yard in three plays and settled for Matt Bryant's 19-yard field goal to take a 29-21 lead with 2:21 to go.

McNair made the Giants pay with a 9-yard TD pass to tight end Frank Wycheck barely in the end zone with nine seconds to play. A video review allowed the catch, and McNair ran straight ahead for the conversion to tie the game at 29.

Panthers 13, Browns 6

CLEVELAND (AP) – After nearly three months of self destruction, the Panthers finally damaged somebody else's season.



Dee Brown rushed for 122 yards in his first career NFL start as Carolina ended an eight-game losing streak Sunday with a 13-6 win over Cleveland (6-6), crippling the slipping Browns' playoff chances.

The Panthers (4-8), who began the season 3-0, won for the first time since Sept. 22 and ended a string of futility that included all sorts of off-field problems – the most notable being wide receiver Steve Smith's assault of teammate Anthony Bright during a film session.

TIM TURNER TAKES A BACKHANDED SHOT AGAINST DARTMOUTH GOALTENDER DARREN GASTROCK IN THE 7-2 MINUTEMAN VICTORY SATURDAY AFTERNOON AT THE MULLINS CENTER. LATER IN THE GAME, TURNER MOVED INTO 10TH ON THE ALL-TIME UMASS SCORING LIST.

contest outscoring its opponents 17-5 in the third period and held true to form against the Big Green. Mauldin's rocket past Darren Gastrock at 5:53 gave his squad all the momentum, and Anderson's second shorthanded tally of the contest – on a 3-on-1 – was more than enough to seal the deal.

But the Minutemen were not finished until they had put four pucks by Gastrock in the final frame, capped by Mauldin's third of the game with 11 seconds to go.

"I wasn't really thinking about getting the hat trick," Mauldin said. "I just wanted to go to the net and depend on my instincts."

Gabe Winer made 15 saves on the night for the Maroon and White, and was relieved by freshman Michael Waidlich for the final 2:44.

"Gabe, as he's been all year, was reliable," Cahoon said. "He made a couple of terrific saves in the second period that kept us in it. The team really responds to him."

On Tuesday, Turner scored a pair of goals for the Minutemen, and the visiting team pulled away from Vermont (4-7-2, 2-4-0 ECAC) in a wild third period for a 6-2 victory. The Maroon and White got three goals from its defense in the final frame to put the Catamounts away for good.

"It was a good game for us tonight, because of the energy we played with," Cahoon said. "We also did a good job of standing up in the middle of the rink and controlling that end of things. That has a lot to do with the forwards supporting the 'D' and the 'D' reading situations. I was very pleased."

Nick Kuiper and Matt Fetzer scored on goals from the outside against netminder Matt Hanson to get the ball rolling in the final frame. Then Jeff Lang scored on a breakaway immediately after coming out of the penalty box and went five-hole to ensure the victory for the Maroon and White. Werner tacked on a late goal for UMass.

Winer was forced to make just nine saves on the night for the Minutemen, as the UMass forecheck set up a stellar defensive effort.

Three wins boost UM over .500 mark

By Matt Brads
Collegian Staff

Long regarded as the college hockey's best conference in the east, the Eastern Collegiate Hockey Association's youngest blood dealt the Eastern Collegiate Athletics Conference a major blow over the past five days.

UMass	5
Princeton	3
UMass	7
Dartmouth	2
UVM	2

The Massachusetts hockey team went 3-0 on the road this weekend, besting a trio of ECAC squads by a combined score of 18-7. The Minutemen (8-5-0, 3-4-0 ECAC) topped Princeton on the road Tuesday (6-2), UMass scored a pair of home contests against Dartmouth (7-2) and Princeton on Sunday (5-3).

Though the Maroon and White has now matched last season's win total, UMass Head Coach Don Cahoon is far from celebrating his team's good fortune.

"That wasn't a ceiling I was looking to hit for," Cahoon said. "We've gotten to our first floor level, so hopefully we can start climbing some stairs."

The Minutemen were led by the new found line of Greg Mauldin, Stephen Werner and Matt Anderson, which lit the lamp nine times this weekend, putting together 21 points in the three-game ECAC set. The line's play was highlighted by Mauldin's hat trick against the Big Green on Saturday night, the first by a Maroon and White player since Gerry Cahill and Warren Norris both scored three in an 8-0 drubbing of Army Nov. 22, 1986.

"It's fun playing with two really good freshmen," said Mauldin, who led the Minutemen in scoring as a freshman last year. "They move the puck really well. It just makes everything easy."

The Maroon and White commanded the play for the majority of all three games and trailed for only 1:32 over the three games – with that coming in the first period of the first contest.

The Minutemen finished off the week end with a victory over Cahoon's former squad, the Princeton Tigers (1-10-0, 1-7-0 ECAC). UMass busted out to a 4-0 lead midway through the second period thoroughly dominating its guests, but nearly saw the game slip through its fingers by way of the penalty box.

The Tigers, who had Cahoon at the helm from 1981-2000, used three power play goals to bring the game within one in the third period, but the Maroon and White held off the visitors, with Mauldin putting an empty-netter through defenseman Neil McCann's legs to seal the win.

"At the end of the year, they're not going to ask how, they're going to ask how many," Cahoon said in reference to his team's backluster play over the latter part of Sunday's contest. "We owe both the positives and the negatives as teaching tools."

It appeared that Massachusetts would walk away with a victory when Peter Trovato put home a rebound at 6:04 of the second. But three interference calls by referee Joe Andrews over a span of 2:41 resulted in a pair of 5-on-3 advantages – both of which the Tigers capitalized on. Princeton again grabbed a goal with a Minuteman in the penalty box when Sebastian Borza put a puck low past Tim Warner (11 saves) at 3:31 of the third.

"We played well in the first and got a little lazy in the second period, but a win is a win," said defenseman Thomas Pock, who is second in scoring among Hockey East blueliners.

Tim Turner scored his seventh goal of the season in the second period, when he put home a rebound of a Marvin Dejon shot on the power play. The goal moved Turner into 10th on UMass' all-time scoring list, with brother Jeff just three points ahead in ninth place.

Saturday saw a 6-3, 0-4, 2-0 ECAC Dartmouth squad come to the Mullins Center hot off a 5-4 overtime victory over No. 1 Boston College on Tuesday. The Big Green went home humbled by the Minutemen, who used four third period goals to seal a 7-2 victory.

"Hockey is a game of intensity, emotion and passion," Dartmouth Head Coach Bob Gaudet said. "When you don't have that and the other team does, this is what happens. But UMass played better than we did. They wanted it more and I don't want to diminish that."

The Minutemen completely outplayed their guests in the first period, outshooting Dartmouth 11-3 in the opening 20 minutes. Mauldin and Werner got a pair of goals in the frame, both a result of relentless attacking of the Big Green cage.

All three second-period tallies were scored on the Big Green power play, with freshman Hugh Jessiman and senior Pete Summerlelt scoring on the man advantage for Dartmouth. Adding to the mix was Anderson's breakaway shorthanded goal at 14:17, the Maroon and White's first man-down tally of the year.

The Maroon and White entered the

FRESHMAN MATT ANDERSON SCORED TWO SHORTHANDED GOALS AGAINST DARTMOUTH THIS WEEKEND. ANDERSON WAS THE MVP OF THREE GAMES WITH UMASS OPPONENTS LAST WEEK.

Young first line all on same page

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

They looked like a trio of old friends, elbowing one another, giggling in unison and looking to another for an answer to the absurd question, "Do you guys like playing together?"

Realizing that as a sophomore, Greg Mauldin is the ancient on the line with freshmen Matt Anderson and Stephen Werner, he reluctantly leans forward with a response.

"Um, yeah."

Mauldin's retort is appropriately brief. Because if you saw Saturday's game against Dartmouth, you'd understand that their play speaks for itself.

The young trio combined for six goals and 11 points against the Big Green, a team just removed from a 5-4 win over top ranked Boston College.

It's the type of performance that has sportswriters clamoring for cliches and storylines. Just one day later a story by Springfield Union-News and Sunday Republican writer Dick Baker proclaimed them the "WAM" line, for the first initial in each of the players surnames.

Usually it takes a little longer for a line to earn a nickname. Especially in the modern age of athletes tagging themselves. Apparently these guys made an impression, and not just with the media.

UMass coach Don Cahoon has taken notice, saying after the Dartmouth game that it was a good bet the three would stay together for a while. A good bet considering they seem to be the cure for UMass' offensive ills.

In three games, all wins, Werner, Anderson and Mauldin have lit it up for nine goals and 21 points.

Not only that, but in the three victories over ECAC opponents Vermont, Dartmouth and Princeton, the Minutemen managed 18 total goals.

As much as it shows on the stat-sheet, the effect of finally having a legitimate first scoring line will run deeper than mere numbers.

Now opposing teams will have to match a checking line with the "WAM" line, opening things up for the likes of Tim Turner, Chris Capraro and Tim Vitek.

That was evidenced against Princeton yesterday when UMass got goals from three of the four forward lines and a defenseman. And to think, Mauldin is the oldest on the line as a sophomore.

Right now the line completely changes the complexion of the offense. If still together in a few years, they could change the complexion of the UMass record books.

Now all they need is a good nickname.

Miami, OSU still on top of AP poll

By Richard Rosenblatt
Associated Press

Miami is a unanimous No. 1 in the AP poll again, and Southern California moved into the top five for the first time in more than seven years.

The Hurricanes (11-0) strengthened their grip on the top spot in The Associated Press Top 25 poll Sunday, receiving 73 first-place votes and 1,825 points from the sports writers and broadcasters on the AP panel.

Last week, No. 2 Ohio State (13-0) had two first-place votes.

Miami beat Syracuse 49-7 on Saturday, and close out the regular season Saturday against Virginia Tech. A win over the Hokies and the Hurricanes will meet Ohio State in the BCS national title game at the Fiesta Bowl on Jan. 3. The Buckeyes completed their regular season last week.

Texas, co-Big Ten champions with Ohio State, moved up a spot to No. 3. The Hawkeyes (11-1) replaced Oklahoma which dropped to No. 8 after a 38-28 loss to Oklahoma State.

Georgia (11-1), a 51-7 winner over Georgia Tech, improved to No. 4 followed by Southern California. The Trojans (10-2) topped Notre Dame 44-13, and rose to No. 5 for the first time since Oct. 15, 1995. The Irish (10-2) fell to No. 11 from No. 7.

Kansas State was No. 6, followed by Washington State, Oklahoma, Texas and Penn State.

The USA Today/ESPN coaches poll had the same top seven as the AP poll, with Miami receiving all but two of the 61 first-place votes.

West Virginia (9-3) made the biggest jump this week, to No. 15 from No. 24 – after a 24-17 over Pittsburgh. Florida State (9-4) advanced seven spots to No. 16 after its 31-14 win over Florida.

Florida, Colorado State and Pittsburgh each fell eight places, and were ranked Nos. 23, 24 and 25 respectively.

Arkansas, 21-20 winners over LSU, moved into the Top 25 at No. 22. LSU dropped out of the AP poll. The AP final regular-season poll will be released next Sunday.

The Bowl Championship Series standings, which uses the AP and coaches polls, computer rankings, strength of schedule, win-loss record, and bonus points determines who plays in its national title game. The final BCS standings will be released Dec. 8.

Games next Saturday that will determine BCS bowl fates are Washington State at UCLA, Virginia Tech at Miami, Georgia vs. Arkansas in the Southeastern Conference title game, and Oklahoma vs. Colorado for the Big 12 crown.

The champions of six major conferences – ACC, Big East, Big Ten, Big 12, Pac-10 and SEC – are guaranteed spots in either the Fiesta, Rose, Sugar or Orange bowls. Two at-large teams are then selected by bowl officials using a complicated system involving final BCS rankings.

Three conference champions have already been determined – Florida State in the ACC, Miami in the Big East and Ohio State in the Big Ten. Among the teams competing for at-large berths are Iowa, Notre Dame and USC. The Trojans, though, can still win the Pac-10 if UCLA beats Washington State on Saturday.

FRESHMAN MICHAEL LASME SCORED 14 POINTS ON 6-FOR-8 SHOOTING AGAINST CHAMINADE IN THE MINUTEMEN'S 69-55 VICTORY OVER THE SILVERSWORDS AT THE MAUI INVITATIONAL.

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

Other than an opportunity to raise the stakes in the poker room with aces-full, this doesn't seem like a big game for the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

After all, the Minutemen (1-2) are playing just their fourth game of the season against Central Connecticut State tonight at the Mohegan Sun Resort and Casino in Uncasville, Conn.

It shouldn't be an important game. At least, not to anyone who doesn't subscribe to the idea that the most significant contest is the next one.

But it is.

The Maroon and White have two very tough, very important games over the next eight days and getting to .500 now is imperative. A win over CCSU tonight would give UMass its second straight win and some much needed confidence after starting the season 0-2.

Coach Steve Lappas' squad showed its youth in its first game at the Maui Invitational last week – an 84-71 loss to No. 19 Indiana. Despite flashes of greatness, especially from junior forward Raheim Lamb (17 points, 12 rebounds), the Minutemen couldn't keep up with the Hoosier attack, especially down low.

The second round saw major scoring droughts and only 24 minutes from center Micah Brand, who entered the tourney with an ankle injury. The Minutemen couldn't find the basket in their 69-53 loss to Utah. Forward Jackie Rogers was the only UMass player to score in double figures, as No. 2 scored 17 points on 7-for-12 shooting along with a team-high six rebounds. The defensive woes on underneath continued, as Utes center Tim Frost scored 17 points on 7-for-10 shooting.

The Minutemen were finally able to get a win in the final game of the Maui Invitational, as The Maroon and White beat Division II Chaminade 69-55. The backcourt carried the load in the victory, with second year point guard Anthony Anderson leading the way on 6-for-12 shooting (4-for-10 for three) for 20 points. Freshman guard Mike Lasme came off the bench for 14 points on 6-for-8 shooting from the field.

After tonight's game against CCSU, the Minutemen play against their two biggest non-Atlantic 10 rivals, Boston College and Connecticut. With both teams likely to be in the hunt for an NCAA Tournament bid, a pair of losses isn't out of the question.

So getting out of Mohegan Sun tonight 2-2 is vital.

Bush: signs of Iraqi cooperation not good

By Ron Fournier
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) - President Bush said Monday "the signs are not encouraging" that Saddam Hussein will cooperate with weapons inspectors and avoid a war threatened by the United States.

As a Sunday deadline neared, the president said he won't tolerate "any act of delay, deception or defiance."

Even as U.N. investigators reported progress in their first week of work, Bush said war may prove necessary. "The temporary peace of denial and looking away from danger would only be a prelude to broader war and greater horror," he said.

"America will confront gathering dangers early before our options become limited and desperate."

Weapons inspectors are carrying out a United Nations resolution ordering Saddam to rid Iraq of chemical, biological and nuclear weapons or face the prospect of war.

The resolution gives Iraq until Sunday to disclose its weapons of mass destruction.

Iraq's ambassador to the United Nations, Mohammed Al-Douri, said the declaration could be ready as early as Wednesday.

"There will be nothing surprising," Al-Douri said. "We have repeated our position several times that we have nothing hidden."

The White House disputed that contention again Monday. Senior officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said U.S. intelligence has evidence of Saddam's weapons programs and is willing to share it with U.N. inspectors to help rebut the Iraqi declaration.

The U.S. is flying Predator unmanned surveillance aircraft to look for signs of Iraq's noncompliance with the inspections, said a defense official, also speaking on the condition of anonymity.

The U.N. inspectors completed their first week of work Monday by visiting alcoholic beverage plants and a factory that once made parts for now-banned missiles.

While inspectors said some equipment of interest was missing at the Karama ballistic design plant, they have reported no problems gaining access to suspect sites nor have they made public any findings of deadly weapons.

Marshalls issue subpoena

Bulger ordered to testify before House Reform Committee

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

United States marshals served University of Massachusetts President William Bulger with a subpoena yesterday forcing him to testify on his fugitive mobster brother James "Whitey" Bulger.

According to a release by the Committee of Government Reform, a part of the United States House of Representatives, Bulger will testify in Boston on Friday.

"We issued a subpoena to President Bulger today," Blaine Rethmeier of the Committee said. "It was accepted by his attorney in his office."

Rethmeier said that the Bulger is being subpoenaed as a part of a probe by the Committee looking into "the Justice Department's use of informants in New England during the 1960's."

Jim Wilson, the Committee's chief lawyer, said to the Associated Press that the Committee started the process of issuing the subpoena because Bulger's lawyer, Thomas Kiley, was so emphatic that Bulger would not appear voluntarily.

It is possible that Kiley could seek action to prevent Bulger from testifying. If the subpoena is not blocked, Bulger faces imprisonment he doesn't appear.

Rethmeier could not reveal specifically what the Committee plans to ask Bulger.

The Committee, which is chaired by U.S. Rep. Dan Burton, R-Indiana, originally had scheduled hearings for Thursday, but extended them through Friday of this week with Bulger testifying.

Bill Wright, a spokesman for Bulger's office said, "The President is discussing this issue with his attorney."

The President's office had no further comment at this time.

According to background information available on their website, the Committee began investigating misconduct by personnel in the Justice Department in Boston.

"Evidence indicates that innocent men were permitted to receive the death penalty for crimes they did not commit (some died in prison, one served 30 years and another served 34 years), government informants committed numerous murders, and murder and drug investigations were ruined in order to protect informants," the oversight on the website states.

The website also states that a major focus of the investigation is the 1968 prosecution of Edward "Teddy" Deegan for a murder committed in 1965.

The trial led to further investigations, with Joseph "The Animal" Barboza's testimony leading to the convictions of six people.

The oversight said that evidence the Committee provided showed that Barboza and his partner and friend, Vincent James Flemmi, committed the murder, but that Barboza would not give up any information incriminating Flemmi.

"Barboza bluntly told FBI agents that he would not give them any information that would allow Jimmy Flemmi to 'fry,'" the website said.

The Committee said that they uncovered that the FBI was actively recruiting Flemmi as a "Top Echelon" informant at the time that he committed the Deegan murder.

They said that despite reports from other informants that they believed that Flemmi would not hesitate to kill again, the FBI continued to recruit Flemmi as an informant.

World AIDS Day remembered

AIDS ACTIVIST KIARAN HONDERICH ADDRESSES LISTENERS IN THE CAMPUS CENTER LAST NIGHT.

By Hirak Shah

AIDS activist Kiaran Honderich described the AIDS epidemic in Africa as a "catastrophic situation" last night in the Campus Center as a part of World AIDS day at the University of Massachusetts.

Honderich started by sharing details of a recent five-month trip that she took to Senegal and South Africa. She said that according to the United Nations, 42 million people worldwide are HIV positive, with 25 million of them in the Sub-Sahara region of Africa. Of the 25 million that are HIV positive 58 percent are women. Honderich said that the most common way these women get HIV is through heterosexual sex.

She said that in Africa alone, 17 million people have died due to AIDS, with more than 3.7 million of them being children. The majority of the HIV cases are in southern Africa. According to Honderich, Botswana has the highest concentration with 38.8 percent of adults HIV positive.

Honderich said the difference between AIDS and past worldwide epidemics like the plague is that "AIDS hits people in the late teens, 20's and 30's," whereas the plague hit people that were either extremely young or extremely old. She said that southern Africa faces other problems, such as famine. Fourteen to 15 million people are at risk due to the famine.

She said that the famine is caused by AIDS because the people that would be growing food are either dying or have to take care of loved ones that have AIDS.

Honderich says rich countries like America are behaving very poorly in regards to the AIDS situation. She pointed to the U.N. setting up a global fund to help combat the disease as an example, saying that for the global fund to function, it would need 10 billion dollars annually. The U.S. was asked to contribute $2.2 billion to the fund. She said that the U.S. only contributed 300 million, which will be spread out over the next three years.

The activist also addresses drug companies that have patented drugs to fight AIDS charging high prices. According to her, drug companies charge about $10,000 per person to use the medicine. She also said that the U.S. government will not allow countries to buy the generic drugs made, which would cost roughly around $300.

Honderich was asked why AIDS was centered on Africa. She said that the reasons are "mostly because of poverty, inequality, and structure of the countries economy."

She said that in 16 African countries, more than 10 percent of adults are HIV positive. An estimated 600,000 African infants become infected with HIV through mother to child transmission, either at birth or through breast-feeding.

According to Honderich, right now there are about 13 million orphans in the effected countries, and by 2010, that number will rise to about 44 million. She mentioned that the groups hardest hit are the young adults between the ages of 15 and 24. Often infected teenagers at the beginning of their sex life have young children by the time they die. Also, in countries such as South Africa, Zambia, Zimbabwe, and Botswana, over half of

Al-Qaida potentially linked to Kenya attacks

By John J. Lumpkin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) - American counterterror officials said Monday that evidence is mounting the al-Qaida network was behind last week's attacks in Kenya, pointing to missile launchers used in the attack and a claim of responsibility on an extremist Islamic Web site.

U.S. authorities regard the al-Qaida claim, posted on the Web site www.azfalrasas.com, as credible, officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity. They said the government has obtained other, unspecified information that suggests Osama bin Laden's organization was responsible for Thursday's attacks, which targeted Israelis.

The Web site statement called the attacks a Ramadan greeting to the Palestinian people and referred to al-Qaida's deadly attacks in 1998 against U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

"At the same place where the Jewish Crusader coalition' was hit four years ago, ... here the fighters ... came back once again to strike heavily against that evil coalition," the statement said. "But this time, it was against Jews."

In addition, two anti-aircraft missile launchers recovered after the failed attack on an Israeli airliner as it took off from Mombasa airport in Kenya are from the same production batch as one that an al-Qaida operative fired in Saudi Arabia at a U.S. military plane in May, officials said.

The discovery suggests another al-Qaida link to the Kenya attacks, because the portable heat-seeking missiles probably were obtained as a group, the officials said.

On Thursday, attackers launched two missiles at an Israeli charter airliner just after it took off from Mombasa for Tel Aviv, Israel, with 261 passengers and 10 crew members. Both missed, and the Arkia Airlines Boeing 757, landed safely at its destination.

About the same time, there was a vehicle bombing of an Israeli-owned hotel in Mombasa, killing 10 Kenyans, three Israelis and the three bombers.

Simultaneous terrorist attacks are a trademark of al-Qaida, and authorities immediately suspected bin Laden's organization in the Kenya attacks. U.S. officials also suggested an affiliated Islamic extremist network from Somalia, al-Ithaad al-Islamiya, may have played a role.

"There are suspicions" al-Qaida was behind the Kenya attacks, White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said on Monday. Kenyan officials have detained at least 12 people in connection with the attacks.

To make the missile connection, investigators compared the serial numbers on the two discarded launchers found Thursday outside the airport in Mombasa, Kenya, with the number on the launch tube recovered outside Prince Sultan Air Base in Saudi Arabia seven months ago. The numbers were close, officials said.

Thousands of this kind of missile, known in Western countries as the SA-7b Grail, have been produced in Russia, Eastern Europe, China, Yugoslavia, Egypt and elsewhere. They chase the heat produced by an airplane engine and explode but are effective only while the target plane is flying low and slow.

A 30-year-old design also known by its Russian name, Strela, or "Arrow," these missiles are widely available on arms black markets. U.S. officials said they cost $500 to $5,000; newer, better shoulder-fired surface-to-air missiles like the SA-14 sell for $10,000 or $20,000.

The plane attack was similar to a high-ranking Sudanese al-Qaida operative's attempt to shoot down a U.S. military aircraft in May.

That operative, Abu Huzifa, fired an SA-7 at a military plane flying near Prince Sultan Air Base, where many U.S. forces are based. The attack failed and went undetected until Saudi security forces found the abandoned launcher.

Abu Huzifa was detained in Sudan by local authorities a short time later. He admitted launching the missile, U.S. officials have said.

It is unclear where the missiles were obtained.

The May attack led to an FBI warning suggesting terrorists may try to target civilian aviation with missiles, and Thursday's events renewed worries terrorists may target a U.S. airliner.

Aides said Bush's hope is promptly to...Vice President DICK CHENEY to publicize separate speeches Monday to cast doubt on Saddam's intentions.

So far, the signs are not encouraging," Bush said as he signed a bill to...cuts to farmers to largest spending increases since the Reagan administration.

A regime that...Iraq must...Security Council resolutions and...its evil ways. A regime that sends...Iraqi people and...to...is not taking the path of compliance," Bush said.

He was referring to...Iraq's return to the U.N. protesting...the resolutions.

In Detroit, Cheney spoke...to...about the Sunday deadline. "This...document will not be tolerated," he said. UN Ambassador...Leaders. "The demands of the world will be met, or there will be unavoidable."

Answering critics of Bush's Iraq policy, Cheney also said confronting Saddam is not a distraction from the broader war on terrorism.

Iraq could decide on its own to provide bodies for...Instead, it appears to...terrorist group set to...Qaeda terrorists," Cheney said. "The war on terror will not be won until Iraq is completely and verifiably disarmed of weapons of mass destruction."

Yet there also were signs that Bush wanted to be patient. White House press secretary Ari Fleischer said the Iraqi declaration, before the deadline under which inspectors will determine whether it is accurate. Privately, White House officials said they do not expect Bush to take immediate action against Saddam after the deadline, even if Iraq claims not to have weapons of mass destruction.

Instead, the United States will work to help inspectors prove deceptions, officials said.

While putting the onus on Saddam, Bush seemed to set limits on the authority of U.N. inspectors.

"Inspectors do not have the duty or the ability to uncover terrible weapons hidden in a vast country," he said. "The responsibility of inspectors is simply to confirm the evidence of voluntary and total disarmament."

It is Saddam Hussein who has the responsibility to provide that evidence as directed and in full. Any act of delay, deception or defiance will prove that Saddam Hussein has not adopted the path of compliance and has rejected the path of peace," he said.

In London, one of Bush's most hawkish advisers tried to assure wary allies that the president wants to disarm Saddam without a fight.

"Our only hope ... of achieving the peaceful outcome is if we can confront the Iraqi regime with a credible threat of force behind our diplomacy," said Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz at the International Institute of Strategic Studies, an independent think tank.

Even as he spoke of the desire to avoid war, Wolfowitz met privately with Iraqi opposition leaders who could help the United States build a post-Saddam Iraq

Kerry attacks Bush administration plans

By Jennifer Peter
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) – Democratic presidential hopeful John Kerry attacked the Bush administration Monday, saying it gave a boost to insurance companies last week while allowing 1 million people to lose their unemployment benefits just after Christmas.

"This administration is willing to do terrorism insurance for big industry, but they weren't willing to do unemployment compensation for people who are out of work," the senator from Massachusetts said a day after announcing he would form a presidential exploratory committee. "That's the big difference in how we approach the economy."

The White House said Kerry was making a political jab at president Bush, and said voters understood where the president's priorities are.

"It's the political season beginning for the Democrats," said White House spokeswoman Claire Buchan. "The American people know that the president has demonstrated leadership in fighting the war on terrorism and fighting for economic security for the American people. That's the president's focus."

Congress adjourned for the year without extending jobless benefits for laid-off workers facing the expiration of federal unemployment compensation starting Dec. 28.

Last week, President Bush signed a bill that would reimburse the insurance industry up to $100 billion in a future terror attack.

At a news conference Monday, Kerry gave a brief preview of his economic plan, which he plans to lay out Tuesday in Cleveland.

He charged that Bush is focusing on his tax cut while overlooking the plight of working Americans.

"President Bush, beginning with the snows of New Hampshire in the year 2000, has consistently talked about only a tax cut for the wealthiest Americans as his one program," Kerry said.

Kerry reiterated his call for a "tax break to the working families of America now in the form of a payroll tax deduction."

"It puts more money into people's pockets than the president's plan, which is mostly to wealthy people and mostly down the road," Kerry said.

Kerry also said he would call for some spending cuts, business tax incentives, and "a major infrastructure investment in America."

"We need to invest in our cities, in our rural communities," Kerry said. "This administration has ignored that and that's how you put people back to work."

Kerry, a leading Senate liberal and a decorated Vietnam War veteran, announced his presidential intentions on national television Sunday. He said an official announcement of his candidacy is months away.

Exploratory committees are established by budding candidates mainly to raise money, finance travels around the country and help gauge voter support.

Kerry has also criticized Bush on his charter school proposal and accused the administration of abandoning the role of honest broker between Israel and the Palestinians.

Asked Sunday night about the prospect of running against Kerry, Bush smiled at reporters but said nothing.

Kerry, a 58-year-old former prosecutor first elected to the Senate in 1984, was unopposed for re-election in November to a fourth term.

Two Senate colleagues in Boston on Monday to accept foreign policy awards had kind words for Kerry. Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Indiana, had only praise for Kerry when asked about his political vulnerabilities.

"I want to speak about his strengths. I found him to be a very able colleague on the Foreign Relations Committee. I wish him well," Lugar said.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., called Kerry "well-respected" but said it's too early to endorse any Democrat.

"I'll be supporting the candidate who has the greatest chance of winning. I'm not sure who that is yet, but if (Kerry) appears to be that person, surely I'll be supporting him," Levin said.

all 15-year-olds are expected to die of AIDS.

Honderich did mention some steps that groups in Africa are starting to take to promote AIDS awareness, including educating people about safe sex, and using condoms. She talked about the Muslim women she met in Senegal who go to the port to talk to young fishermen about AIDS. She also mentioned a young HIV positive Soweto girl, who is educating and empowering women in a rural community in South Africa.

Honderich is Director of Ulalo (Swahili for 'bridge'), a young Boston-based organization dedicated to building bridge between American and rural African women fighting HIV and AIDS. She is also staff economist with the Center for Popular Economics, lecturer on Social Studies at Harvard University, and founding member of the Boston Global Action Network (BGAN) Africa AIDS Project.

She has traveled and worked in West and South Africa, and spoken before many US audiences about AIDS, women and the global economy. She got her PhD from UMass-Amherst. Currently, she is making a documentary about rural African women and AIDS.

According to the website, Whitey Bulger was one of Flemmi's partners in crime. The "went on to commit dozens of murders while serving as FBI informants," the site stated.

The Associated Press said that during the trial earlier this year of John Connolly, a retired FBI agent, confessed hitman Joseph Martorano testified that William Bulger requested that the FBI protect his brother.

The A.P. said that "Martorano testified that when Connolly asked William Bulger what he could do in return for his help as a youngster growing up in the same neighborhood, the reply was 'Just keep my brother out of trouble.'"

The A.P. said that Bulget has denied the claim.

Whitey Bulger, 73, has been on the run since 1995, when he fled before being indicted on racketeering and extortion charges. Since then, he has been indicted on charges related to 18 other murders, elevating him onto the FBI's Ten Most Wanted List.

Another Bulger brother, John "Jackie" Bulger, was arrested in November of 2001 on charges of perjury related to the investigation of Whitey. Jackie was charged with two incidents of perjury before a federal grand jury and obstruction of justice for alleged false testimony that he gave in 1996, when he said that he had not seen his brother since he had fled in 1995.

According to a Collegian article from November 2001, the FBI claims to have evidence that that Whitey did contact Jackie in 1996 through another person.

Overseas terrorism:

Why is Kenya different?

This past Thursday morning the news told us that terrorists had struck again.

This seems to be commonplace in our increasingly shrinking view of world news. Whether in Israel, Pakistan, Afghanistan, or as the case was Thursday, Kenya, the news of these attacks and threats have become so main stream that media outlets have put them into the templates of their broadcasts and publications.

But there is an ever-changing facet to these attacks that is lost when your head gets twisted around the stories and your mind grows numb from the media inundation we have been subjected to.

We are almost sedated by this torrent of news. The onslaught of late-breaking stories cripples the medium that made the concept practical by making the minor significant and the mediocre fantastic. The stories behind the headlines are hidden in the flashy words and the graphics we first see.

News judgment has always been a part of putting forth the news. Part of the job descriptions of editors and journalists and every rung of the journalism ladder is to determine what should be put forth as pressing, urgent, and "most important."

This discretion has been missing and news that glosses over the severity of terrorism stories has been put in the spotlight. Is there reason for concern after the attacks in Mombasa?

After a failed attempt at shooting down a plane bound for Israel and a successful attempt at bombing a primarily Jewish visited resort in the East African town, sources and stories have been ever changing and circulating.

Right away the terrorist group Al Qaeda was placed at the top of the suspect list. The anti-Israeli group Hamas disconnected themselves from the attack. Another unheard of group claimed ownership in a faxed letter to authorities, but was quickly dismissed.

U.S. interests may be at risk. An announcement released from the state department urges caution for Americans in the area, in the capitol Nairobi and generally, anywhere overseas.

The problem is that our guard has been on high for over a year now. Since September last year it has been an unsafe place both at home and abroad for Americans and "American interests."

We have been watching our backs with every inkling of a threat, and when there is substance – a legitimate attack complete with bombs, missiles, casualties and international squabbling – it is given the same treatment.

The equal coverage for both threats and actual occurrences poses a question about the coverage of these terrorist related events.

Outlets, particularly national news services, should take the lead in giving a fair proportion of coverage to the news behind it and allow the readers to pursue it further if they want to.

The desire to be the first one with the story, the first outlet to report on anything "terrorism" related has blurred the line between news judgment and bandwagon media approaches.

National Day of Mourning:

Thanksgiving's true meaning

ALLISON LESHEFSKY

Thanksgiving comes and goes every year as millions of college students around the country drive home to feast with their family and friends. What a crock! Thanksgiving is celebrated as a day of mourning by Native Americans, since it is representative of the white man's destruction of Native American culture.

Do we have a culture clash here? A jarring of two worldviews for which there can be no compromise? Think about it. As we in the West stuff ourselves, over 33,000 children under the age of five die every day in the third world countries from lack of adequate nutrition, medical care, and drinking water.

We must consider the history of Thanksgiving, and the distorted image of colonization that our culture has placed in our minds. We must ponder why we choose to celebrate such a pathetic cause. We must understand the true meaning and spirit of Thanksgiving, which is to give thanks. We must change our ways.

The original day of Thanksgiving took place in 1621 between the Wampanoag Indians and the first generation of Pilgrims in Plymouth, Massachusetts. The Pilgrims came to Plymouth Rock in a poor and hungered state in which nearly half of them died within a few months from disease and hunger. Despite their knowledge of European slave traders, the Wampanoags fed and clothed them through the cold New England winter as they taught them to grow food on their own.

The act of giving was and still is a strong cultural belief that earns respect within Indian tribes. By giving freely to those that have nothing, it is believed that there would be enough for all. This is contrary to our current system that places emphasis on selling, not giving.

Each year on Thanksgiving, the Wampanoag Indians gather in Plymouth to mourn the death of 10 to 15 million Indians due to European invasion. They have transformed the traditional holiday of Thanksgiving into the National Day of Mourning. This annual gathering originated in 1970 when the Commonwealth of Massachusetts invited Wampanoag leader Frank James to deliver a speech.

This Thanksgiving was no exception to the absurdity of the truth in which we celebrated. Mans of us became gluttons as we stuffed our already overweight bodies with massive amounts of food. The end result: a tight fitting pair of pants, a stomachache, and a good night's sleep. Our gluttony did nothing to help the 840,000,000 people worldwide that suffer from hunger and poverty.

After our annual feast, based solely on greed, we return to our lives here as students in the town of Amherst, which was named after slave trader Lord Jeffrey Amherst, known for giving gifts of blankets that were infected with smallpox to the Native Americans. Our lives will return back to normal as we reengage back into our social lives and academia. Then we will go about the next 364 days with little acknowledgement of our self-righteous behavior, only to fatten ourselves up once again in 2003, same as it ever was.

"This Thanksgiving was no exception to the absurdity of the truth in which we celebrated."

What we need to do is to institute a whole new way of celebrating Thanksgiving. We must change our educational system and teach the south a different and more diverse view of history. Grade school field trips to Plymouth Rock and Plymouth Plantation must be reshaped to incorporate the understanding of the perpetuation of injustice that occurs each Thanksgiving. We must transform our religious institutions that are teaching laws of morality into establishments that devote their energies to peace and social justice. We must reconstruct our local, state, and federal governments so that political leaders dedicate Thanksgiving Day toward raising as much money as possible, not through foreign aid, but directly to organizations such as OXFAM. This way more aid will go directly to give to those who are most needy.

We must change America's one-dimensional way of thinking. Our culture of capitalism and societal values must undergo drastic change. Advertising focused on consumption should be replaced with educational bulletins reminding us of our greed and ability to give.

The entertainment industry must be reshaped into an educational tool to fight injustice.

Although it is impractical to think that Americans are going to give up Thanksgiving altogether, it is not outrageous to think that its values can be reshaped. Russell Peters is a Wampanoag burn and raised in Mashpee, Mass., less than twenty miles from Plymouth. He views the original day of Thanksgiving as an "event that shines forth as an example of the respect that was possible once, if only for the brief span of a single generation in a single place, between two different cultures and as a vision of what may again be possible someday among people of goodwill."

This statement speaks for itself.

Acting out against activism

JOHNNY DONALDSON

A few weeks ago I came home from a late night out to find the TV still on in the living room. My mom had turned it to The Learning Channel (as she often does), but had fallen asleep watching it. The special that was being broadcast that particular night was on law enforcement and how they handle protestors. It was all about how the police had to straddle a delicate line between arresting obstinate activists and doing so without treading upon their civil rights.

There was a brief segment about how some cops in the Northwest had to dismantle a sit-in at a logging compan. a sit-in where mace was the only available option to remove the trespassers. But the trespassers sat and huddled in a way that the police couldn't administer the mace via the traditional manner of spraying it in the eyes, so the cops came up with a fairly novel way of administering it. The used cotton swaps and dabbed in the eyes of the protestors. Of course that lead to a big brouhaha in which the protestors claimed that their civil rights were trampled on because the cops used cruel and unusual punishment.

All this just got me reflecting on how much I hate activists. I mean I truly hate activism, and the people who participate in it. Maybe not activism itself – I'm not completely apathetic – but, well, you'll see what I mean.

I want to say that I don't hate protestors. No, I hate activists. There is a difference here. Protestors and activists may seem like interchangeable beings, but there is a thin line between them. That is, protestors use intelligence and common sense to get their voices heard, while activists are idiots who use their blatant self-regard to annoy as many people as possible.

Activists are the kinds of fools who will block highways to keep trucks from passing, the kinds of people who will chain themselves to trees, the kinds of people who will enter a logging company's office and sit there on the floor without budging. They are the people who think a protest is not effective if the law isn't broken, if people don't get hurt, if personal property isn't destroyed.

In other words, they get no sympathy from me.

I don't have patience for vandals and thieves. I don't agree with the tactics that activists use to further their agendas. Those people that the cops had to swab are nothing but arrogant bullies wrapped in the guise of a social cause. I have no respect for them. I offer no support for them. I would never join their ranks, even if they stood for a cause I stood for. If I get emotionally invested in a cause, it's the end that counts – not the means to reach it.

Even on our own campus, I have been annoyed by activists and their incessant complaining. Most recently, my problems have been with ALANA, which has lost any sort of respect I had for the group. I started to slip because of their belief that their cause was the only important one on campus; anyone who didn't support their fight for full funding was a racist. Yet, they are not deserving of full funding – no special group on campus is.

"Activists are nothing but middle-to-upper class brats who have nothing better to do than cause trouble."

With the economic problems here on campus, education is the top priority, along with student safety and the school's upkeep. Organizations like that must be satisfied with the scraps they get. If you who are involved with good, worthy causes and want to genuinely change the world I applaud you. But for all of you who want to cause a fuss simply because you get to destroy things or act like annoying nitwits, I say bah. You are worthless, and I don't need your kind mucking up everyone's life.

Perspective gained from holiday hoopla

COURTNEY CHARLES

[illegible] the other day that I really haven't enjoyed the holidays since I was about 12. There's something magical about the first snow and the shiny wrapping paper that gets you into the spirit as a kid. You circled it on your school desk and count on your single fist days left before winter break. And then you count them again just to be sure.

Those are the days when you haven't yet realized that your family is dysfunctional, haven't yet realize the clothes your parents wear in public are something to be ashamed of. The holidays are a moment of adventure and excitement. You're in love with the world. Everything about it is a potential miracle.

When you're a kid and you want that new video game, that video game is the world to you. You live in almost anticipation for the moment of truth when the title screen.

Then you're a teenager, and all you care about is to impress the opposite sex. That doll or action figure that you once couldn't live without is now painful to look at it is so ugly. But ya know, the holidays are still all chill and cool and stuff. More than a week off from school, hanging out with the crew, and sleeping as late as is humanly possible.

But then you get even older, and let's face it: things just get crappier. Things will never again be what they once were. The holidays don't seem like a real celebrators time. There's a war going on that no one seems to understand, yet people support it anyway. Millions of children live without healthcare and decent food. The AIDS epidemic is starting to spiral out of control in China and India. There are suicide bombers killing innocent people in Israel.

So what is there to celebrate?

Now it seems like a fight to find something to celebrate.

The economic and political life of this country just got flushed down the George, I mean, John. People who don't want war, people who want to work for peace, remain silent and let the tides of the powerful carry them along. Many of the educated youth such as ourselves, fail to do one of the simplest and most important things: vote.

The country goes to shambles and then all people do is blame those in power while they sit around eating doughnuts and cheesecake and watching the news to see what went wrong during the day. Then they get up off the couch for the holidays to go out and spend their money. Around this time of year, people faithfully parade like sheep to the nearest shopping center to buys gifts. They buy for friends, for family, and for those random people that always just seem to slither out of the woodwork at the last minute.

"The country goes to shambles and then all people do is blame those in power while they sit around eating doughnuts and cheesecake..."

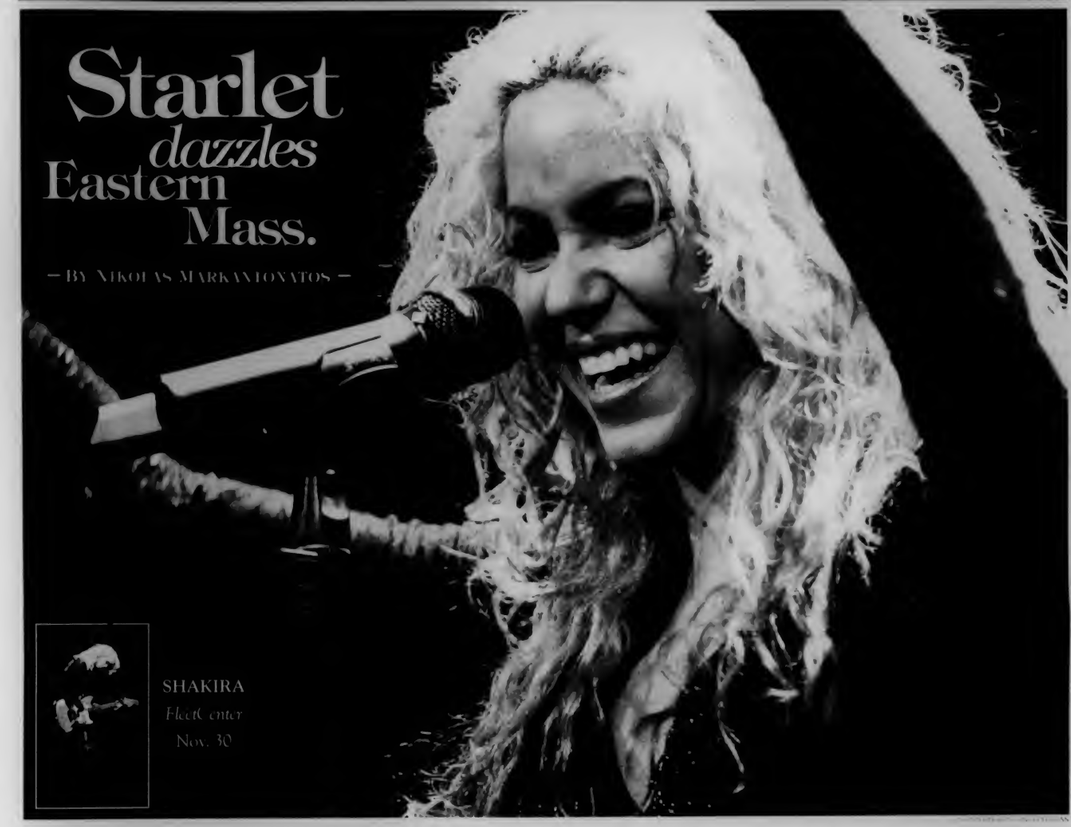
People curse the holidays, the gift giving, the in-laws. They deplore the mounds of fruitcake and stale gingerbread that devastate their homes. People complain about the stress of the holiday season. There's all that shopping to be done, all those relatives to deal with, and for us students, there are final exams.

But how can we justify this tizzy we put ourselves through?

Why don't we step back, and for once look outside the bubble and outside of ourselves and look around at the world today? Too many of us never take the time to stop and catch our breaths. We never look around at the gifts that we have and say, "Damn, my life is good." We take too much for granted. We count on getting that one special gift each year.

If we are attending college or have completed it, then we are in the most highly educated group on the planet. We are the intellectual elite. And yet we sit around. We sit around on our butts and think that we're doing something to help the world by discussing why death and destruction are bad. We drink exotic blends and discuss the failure of world politics and the neoclassical economic theory of capitalism. We try to find what we think is wrong with the world and dissect it. We try to look for answers that great leaders apparently miss. We allow our minds to meld with new and different ideas. We learn how to make a difference. We give advice on how to fix things.

But our message doesn't go far enough. I write this because I too feel I have a better understanding than the average citizen about what's going on in the world today. But I don't feel like I do enough. I should do more to stop the nation from going into a century of debt for a war that most Americans don't understand the meaning of. I don't want to just sit and watch as people kill each other and bomb their neighbors of the world. I want to say that this war should be stopped. I want to say something.



I really think that I should do more.

SHAKIRA
Fleet Center
Nov. 30

BOSTON — LAST YEAR, WHEN Shakira released her first multi-platinum English-language debut, Laundry Service, critics took out their detergent, sent her for a spin cycle and hung her up to dry. Inane lyrics ("... my breasts are small and humble/ so you don't confuse them with mountains") and an odd vocal styling made for one disappointing album.

But at her nearly sold-out performance on Saturday night at Boston's FleetCenter, Shakira played with the audience's eardrums, tormented them with her fiendish beauty, and used that vocal styling to send the crowd to their feet.

The 23-year-old svelte Columbian love machine, who writes much of her own music, was eccentric and lively during the nearly two-hour show, uncontrollably dancing and writhing around onstage. And what a stage it was. Lacking backup dancers and designed to look more like a Nine Inch Nails concert with a nine-piece band, Shakira obviously wanted the show to take on a rock vibe. But she didn't forget her Latin roots, performing more than half of her songs in Spanish (likely pleasing the countless Puerto Rican flag-wavers in the crowd) and incorporating belly dancing into much of the choreography.

Bottle-blond Shakira emerged from billowing stage smoke dancing beneath a giant cobra replica during "Ojos Asi." The crooner, who was barefoot for her entire performance, was strapped in black leather pants and a black bikini top.

Shakira rocked out during "Si Te Vas," before strapping on a guitar for the mid-tempo "Tool," which displayed her rich, layered voice. Her Spanish songs carried more lyrical depth and were sung with more conviction. Nevertheless, the multicultural crowd embraced both the English- and Spanish-language songs.

She then ventured into the salsa-flavored "Ciega Sordomundia" complete with a dance break, pyrotechnic explosions and the first of many inspirational quotes to appear on the monitors.

As she exited the stage, a humorous skit featuring doctors reviving Elvis played on the monitors. With the words "rock 'n' roll will never die" screaming above the stage, Shakira stormed back onstage in Axl Rose attire for a cover of Aerosmith's "Dude (Looks Like a Lady)," featuring a harmonica solo followed by AC/DC's "Back in Black."

But the harmonica and guitar aren't the only instruments Shakira knows how to play, as she rose from beneath the stage banging on drums before belting out "Rules."

Shakira announced she would play a song she wrote for herself, "but now belongs to you" – "Underneath Your Clothes." As if she hadn't exuded enough energy, she upped the pace for "Estoy Aqui," which found her showing all sorts of dance skills, even an impressive robot.

But the night took a somber tone during the protest song "Octavo Dia" where the band donned rubber masks of various political leaders. A grainy video showed the Grim Reaper pulling the strings of President George W. Bush and Saddam Hussein puppets as they played an escalatingly violent game of chess.

Signs of war were quickly, if not jarringly, erased as the stage floor lit up and a number of disco balls descended over the audience for "Ready for the Good Times" and the breezy reggae of "Un Poco de Amor." Indeed, the entire show suffered from irregularity. Although her passion was apparent and infectious, at times Shakira's schizophrenic personas seemed corny.

Shakira closed out the night jubilantly belly-dancing to the bongo-infused "Objection (Tango)." The audience's screams for an encore were answered when Shakira rose from a front platform moving her hips while balancing a chandelier on her head. During the performance of "Whenever, Wherever," the Latin seductress opted to soar above the audience on a giant crane – helping the finale become the peak moment of the night.

As the song winded down, a black-and-white video showed a mongoose attacking a cobra. When the clip ended, the words "bite the head of hatred" appeared on the screen and the house lights came on. Titled the "Tour of the Mongoose," Shakira has explained "the mongoose is the only animal that is immune to the venom of the cobra. To me, the cobra symbolizes all the hate, greed and negativity in the world. We should be more like the mongoose, and bite the head of the cobra."

Even if the show was a tightly scripted affair and Shakira left no deep emotional impression, she certainly knows how to put on a show and how to work a crowd. The name Shakira means "graceful" in Arabic, and she certainly lived up that name during her performance.

Pat the Girl, a five-piece rock band from Cincinnati, opened the show with a lukewarm short set but weren't met with much of a positive response from the largely Latin rock and pop fans.

Matchbox Twenty lighting fire with newest release

MATCHBOX TWENTY
More Than You Think You Are Atlantic Records

The highly anticipated third release from veteran rockers Matchbox Twenty delivers another solid album that's actually worth its priced $13 at Newbury Comics. Just six years ago, when music found itself amidst a sea of faceless alterna/rock bands, Matchbox Twenty burst onto the music scene with an unforgettable black and white video and hit song about physical and mental abuse called "Push." This and many other hit singles off of Yourself or Someone Like You helped to throttle the band to the top of the charts and sell over 12 million copies of their major label debut. Four years later, the band finally stopped touring the United States (over 600 shows in total) and recorded their lyrically superior sophomore album Mad Season. Now, after spending just two years in the studio, More Than You Think You Are breaks new ground with the band's sound, lyrics and overall style. If anything, Matchbox Twenty's new album shows the true diversity of the band and their musical influences.

COURTESY STEVE TANNON/STEINWORKS

The album slaps you in the face with its first track "Feel." Immediately you are awoken to the sound of classic hard rock with a layering of guitar riffs, thundering drums and more edge and energy than typical Matchbox Twenty songs usually deliver. This kind of raw anger and emotion is reminiscent of such tracks as "Long Day" and "Crutch" that evened out the melancholy, calming feeling of the rest of the previously released songs. The record begins and ends in the atypical style singer/songwriter Rob Thomas deemed "disco-rock" in VH1 interview for "Behind the Music" that will air Saturday, Dec 21 at 7 p.m.

Getting back to their southern roots, the band also ventured into a bluegrass/country feel with banjos and mellotrons (on a few tracks – a style never showcased before on previous albums. Adding to this southern style was the interplay of back up vocals and instruments chosen to flesh out the songs. Full gospel choirs and piano emphasis gave the soulful southern touch that made songs such as "Downfall" as unforgettable and as emotional as Madonna's "I like a Prayer." With its sincere and heartfelt repetitive chorus of "Hear me now/ give all that's within you/ be my savior, and I'll be your downfall," "Downfall" proves to have a different, yet appealing sound. However, the song still has the lyrical trademark of cryptic verses and haunting choruses, typifying Matchbox Twenty.

The middle tracks pack the usual Matchbox Twenty fanfare with their deeply emotional, raw lyrics that are tough to digest after just one listen. These songs also carry the echoed, serene sounds that made "Hang," "Bed of Lies" and "Back to Good" so popular on their previous albums, but most memorable is "The Difference." "Every word you never said, echoes down your empty heart," sings the artistry Thomas, describing love and the loss of it. The lyrics, "When she was warm and tender/and you held her arms around you/there was nothing but her love and affection/she was crazy for you/and now she's a part of something you lost," further elaborates this theme. In the "Behind the Music" interview, Rob admitted to writing this song after having an argument with his wife. Although the songs and the titles ("Cold," "Feel" and "Unwell") seem to have a depressing undercurrent of pain and torture, the members of Matchbox Twenty could be far from that, for Thomas reports his lyric inspirations come from thoughts of "What if?"

The growth in Rob Thomas' lyrics in More Than You Think You Are is tremendous. From his first band, Tabitha's Secret, and the sills, immature lyrics to the catchy "Jesus was an Alien," Thomas progressed to venting out high school traumas in "Busted" on Yourself or Someone Like You, and deceit and betrayal in "Bed of Lies" on Mad Season. In Matchbox Twenty's third record, the lyrics have finally showed a polished maturity and a broad depth and diversity in their creation. The aptly named album makes a cathartic way for band members to cleanse themselves of the insecurities that plagued them, along with recovering from heavy drug and alcohol abuse, to realize they are more than they think they are.

More Than You Think You Are is the kind of album you can repeatedly play straight through while doing homework and never grow tired of it. It has the song with hypnotic melodies you find yourself unknowingly humming as you go about your day – the song that makes you smile. That's what makes Matchbox Twenty and this album such a success.

Devils have their due

UMass nets just 17 in second half

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

CCSU	46
UMass	45

UNCASVILLE, Conn. – Lack of execution befell the UMass basketball team in a 46-45 loss to Central Connecticut State University.

The Minutemen failed to execute during a 21-8 Blue Devil run that encompassed most of the second half.

The same could be said as freshman Mike Lasme threw away an inbound pass trailing by two with under a minute to play.

Finally, UMass put the final in its own coffin as a play designed for a game-tying three broke down to a fackie Rogers fast-up as time expired.

"We're not playing smart," UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "We don't know what we're doing out there."

Combo guard Ricardo Scott led the Blue Devils with 18 points, including 14 during the decisive second half run. The junior was 2-for-4 from behind the arc, including a clutch trifecta with just under two minutes left to put the Blue Devils up 44-41.

"I believed it was going in because he is a money player," CCSU coach Howie Dickenman said.

"I was wide open and it went down," Scott added.

Marcus Cox answered just moments later with a driving lay-up to cut the deficit to one. A strong defensive stop as CCSU ran down the shot clock gave UMass possession, but Lasme's errant inbound led to an intentional foul by point guard Anthony Anderson.

John Alexander hit both his free throws to push the lead back to three, prompting a timeout by Lappas to set up a potential game-tying play. Lappas said the play was designed for Anderson to come off a screen at the top of the key, but that was negated by a defensive rotation.

The second option was a Lasme backscreen for Brand shooting out to the wing but the ball was deflected to Rogers who instinctively went strong to the hoop for two.

UMass looked in control when, despite some cold first half shooting, a stifling defensive scheme staked it out to a 28-17 lead at the break. Unfortunately for the Minutemen, that cold streak continued in the second, while the Blue Devils chipped away at the deficit.

Junior guards Marcus Cox and Anderson were a combined 3-18 from the floor for seven points. The pair came into the game averaging over 18 points an outing.

"I think they're going to fall sooner or later," Anderson said. "It doesn't really affect me."

The offensive bright spot for the Minutemen was the frontline play of Brand and Rogers. The senior co-captains took advantage of a small-ish Blue Devil lineup to drop 24 points on 11-20 shooting.

UMass was dominant in the paint, outscoring CCSU almost three-fold. But that stat was padded by a successful first half. For one reason or another UMass was resigned to outside shooting in final 20 minutes, which led to two separate scoring droughts of over five minutes.

"We had trouble getting the ball inside," Lappas said. "They played good defense. We didn't get the same quality shots in the second half."

On the flipside, the Blue Devils took advantage, as their leading scorer, Scott, came to life in the second. He was supported by a balanced attack in which six different players hit field goals.

Despite the comeback, the Blue Devils never shot the ball well.

"You have to try and lose to hold somebody to 32 percent shooting and lose," Lappas said. "It's very hard to do."

For the Minutemen it's a step back with perennial powerhouse UConn and Bay State rival Boston College looming. But for the Blue Devils it's a step forward for this team and the program.

"This was a great win for Central Connecticut basketball," Dickenman said. "This was a win that had a lot of heart."

Anthony Anderson and the Minutemen couldn't manage much offense as they dropped their second straight game. The Huskies scored 46 points on just 17 second half points.

Minutewomen split Thanksgiving trip

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

UMass	73
Toledo	61
Michigan	91
UMass	65

Over the Thanksgiving weekend the Massachusetts women's basketball team experienced firsthand the highs and lows of having one of the toughest schedules in the nation.

After narrowly defeating Saint Peter's, 52-49, last Monday in game one of its season-long three-game road trip, UMass traveled to the Midwest for contests against another two teams that made 2002 NCAA Tournament appearances – Michigan and Toledo.

The Minutewomen would return to Amherst with a split of the two games and an impressive 5-1 start to the season after being buried by Michigan, 91-65, Friday and then turning it around to defeat Toledo, 73-61, Sunday.

Finally following through on a request made by Head Coach Marnie Ducko of getting off to good starts, the Minutewomen began the game against the Rockets with a 14-1 run at Savage Hall in Toledo. The scoring spree lasted through the first 5:24 of contest and by midway in the first half UMass had a commanding 13-point lead.

The Maroon and White contin-

ued its dominance over Toledo later in the first frame when it added to its lead with a 19-0 run spanning the final seven minutes of the half. After shooting 68 percent from the field, UMass had a 41-16 advantage over Toledo at the break.

Senior center Jen Butler and sophomore guard Katie Nelson were instrumental in the run as they each scored 12 points in the first half. Butler added a 44th-career double-double to her resume as she finished the game with 19 points and 16 rebounds against the Rockets.

In the second half, the Rockets attempted to counter the monstrous first half by UMass with an abundance of three-pointers. However, despite going 9-15 from downtown in the second half, the Rockets were only able to get within eight.

There were just too many weapons on the UMass side. Senior forward Nekole Smith put in a season-high 18 points, including her second career three pointer.

The loss for Toledo was its first of the season – giving the Rockets a record of 2-1.

In Ann Arbor, Mich. on Friday afternoon, the Minutewomen saw how playing one of the better programs in the nation could be depressing, maybe even embarrassing.

Michigan shot the lights out on its home floor at Chrisler Arena against UMass to a tune of 59 percent for the game. The Wolverines' high shooting marks for the game can be attributed to their even higher percentage in the first half – 73 percent.

The Minutewomen couldn't keep up with the razor-sharp shooting of the Wolverines and were down by 17 at the break. An 18-4 run by Michigan in the second half spanning the first seven minutes ended the Maroon and White's chances of a victory. The final score was 91-65.

"We have to give credit to Michigan," Massachusetts Head Coach Marnie Ducko said. "They found out our weaknesses and exploited them. Even in our new defense, we were clearly manhandled. It was a pretty frustrating night. We had our open looks, but the ball was just not going in."

Two move on from A-10

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

It wasn't the way people expected, but two of the three Atlantic 10 teams in the Division I-AA Playoffs advanced to the second round this weekend. What was surprising was the teams that did manage to move on.

Villanova overcame a large deficit to a talented Furman team to triumph at home 45-38, while long-bid Maine came back to defeat Appalachian State 14-13. Heavily favored Northeastern, however, fell at home to Patriot League champs in Fordham 29-24.

Comeback special

The Wildcats trailed 24-7 and 31-14 to Furman at home, but used a 24-point fourth quarter to take the victory 45-38. A-10 Offensive Player of the Year Brett Gordon led the way for the Cats, going 27-of-40 for 250 yards and three touchdowns in the contest. Jerry Butler's five-yard run with 3:08 to play in the contest sealed the deal for Nova, who used last-minute magic for the second week in a row. In the final week of the regular season, Gordon got a touchdown pass to Brian White with less than a minute to go to get into the I-AA playoffs.

White hauled in nine passes for 108 yards and a touchdown, while tight end Matt Chila caught six balls for 45 yards and a score. Butler paved the way on the ground, running 11 times for 70 yards.

Furman entered the game ranked sixth in the nation, and received a solid performance from quarterback Billy Napier. He went 26-of-41 for 310 yards through the air and scored a pair of touchdowns on the ground. The Paladins turned the ball over three times to Villanova's one.

Nova will plays host to Fordham this weekend.

Rams pull off upset

By finishing off their season with a victory, the Northeastern Huskies received a share of the A-10 title and the conference's automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament. Coach Dan Brown was named A-10 Coach of the Year and Parsons Field was deemed one of the toughest places to play in I-AA.

The Fordham Rams didn't seem to care.

The Rams took down the high-flying Huskies with a 29-24 triumph in Brookline Saturday.

A 52-yard touchdown from Kevin Eakin to Peter Modelski just over two minutes into the game set the tone, and the Rams did not even allow the Huskies to tie the game after that.

Eakin went 20-for-37 going for 269 yards and a touchdown, while Kirwin Watson took care of things on the ground, running for 101 and a score. Matt Fordyce nailed five field goals on five tries for the visitors, two coming at distances of greater than 40 yards.

Tim Gale ran the ball 29 times for NU, picking up 123 yards and a pair of scores. Shawn Brady completed just half of his passes, throwing one interception and failing to throw a touchdown for the home squad.

Williams shakes off the pressure

When signal-caller Jake Eaton went down with an injury three weeks ago, Maine was likely destined for a spot in the NCAAs no matter what happened.

But after getting a trip to the tourney and going on the road to Appalachian State, few around the A-10 gave the Black Bears a chance with Jon Meczywor throwing the ball.

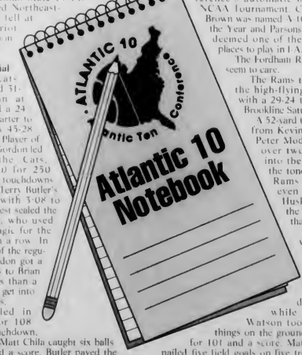
But running back Marcus Williams was more than up to the challenge of playing without the team's fearless leader.

He picked up 157 yards on the ground, including the go-ahead touchdown, a 41-yard scamper with 9:41 to go in the game. Meczywor went just 7-for-15, but achieved 86 yards and a touchdown, throwing no interceptions on the day.

The "Black Hole" defense dominated the Mountaineers, led by Buck Buchanan Award candidate Stephen Cooper, who had 13 tackles and a pair of sacks in the victory. The defense held App. State's all-time leading passer, Joe Burchette, to just nine completions and kept him under 100 yards. Burchette's one-yard plunge in the third quarter was the only touchdown of the game for the Mountaineers.

Maine will travel to Georgia Southern for a second-round matchup next weekend.

Elite Eight



Massachusetts landed eight members on the All-A-10 team. Three members – seniors Adrian Zullo (wide receiver), Maikel Miret (offensive line) and David Sanger (punter) – were named to the conference's first team. Zullo made the top unit for the second time in his career, the first coming following his stellar 1999 campaign.

R.J. Cobbs led the way for the second team, as the freshman also garnered A-10 Rookie of the Year honors. Also on the second team were defensive standouts Valdamar Brower and Jeremy Cain, who led the way for a UMass defense that was the backbone behind five consecutive A-10 victories in the middle of the season.

Safety Anton McKenzie and kicker Doug White made the third team for the Maroon and White.

Stephen Cooper and the "Black Hole" defense held Appalachian State to 13 points on Saturday and will look to continue the trend at Georgia Southern.

Activist returns from Japan

Graduate student Martina Robinson and attorney Annie Tummino speak about global disability rights in the Cape Cod Lounge. The speech was sponsored by ALANA and several other student organizations.

UMass graduate student speaks on her experience

By Courtney Charles
Collegian Staff

Ninety-five percent of disabled people live below the global poverty level, according to Martina Robinson, a graduate student at the University of Massachusetts who spoke last night in the Cape Cod Lounge.

Robinson, and her personal assistant Annie Tummino, a recent graduate in Women's Studies and Social Thought and Political Economy, discussed their experiences at the World Assembly of Disabled People in Japan.

The multi-media presentation, "And the World Assembled: A Celebration of the International Day of Disabled Persons" featured slides and video clips from the conference in Japan and of disabled groups throughout the world.

"I felt really honored that I was able to attend the conference in Japan," Tummino said. "I was so impressed by the welcoming attitude, friendliness, and coming together of the group at the conference."

Three thousand delegates from all over the world attended the conference, according to Tummino.

"I felt a little nervous because I'd never interacted with that many people with disabilities," Tummino said. "But then I realized that all I needed to do was be myself and talk to disabled people like I would to able-bodied people."

Tummino said that another delegate thanked her for her kindness around disabled people.

"It should not be a revolutionary act," said Tummino. "It should be an expected thing."

She explained the privilege she experiences on a daily basis is amplified by witnessing Robinson's struggles.

"It occurred to me how much Martina has to struggle to show she is a competent person," said Tummino.

Robinson discussed her struggles in just getting to Japan. She bought two tickets on auction and saved $700 in cash for Japan. She wrote that she was in a wheelchair in the section about special needs.

"Never tell them this," Robinson said.

For Robinson it resulted in a cancelled airline ticket. According to Robinson, the airline cannot cancel a ticket after it has actually been sent to the buyer.

After Robinson and Tummino reached the airport, they were faced with more problems. Robinson did not want to unpack her personal wheelchair, so she said she tried to obtain one of the airport's chairs. The security man would not let her have an airport wheelchair until she went through the security checkpoints, according to Robinson.

Tummino went to look for a wheelchair to use, Robinson said.

"Annie came back with a broken wheelchair from the pile of broken airport wheelchairs," Robinson said. "It was tilting over on one side. It wouldn't even move."

Robinson and Tummino missed their flight to Japan. They had to drive to Newark, N.J. in order to catch a connecting flight, according to Robinson.

When they finally got on a plane, Robinson said they were the last people on, which she doesn't like.

"People stare at you like you're some sort of tourist attraction," Robinson said.

She was seated all the way in the back of the conch section. If she needed to use the disabled accessible bathroom, which was all the way in the first class section, she needed to have a flight attendant escort her.

"If you have to go to the bathroom at three a.m., like I had to, you wake everyone up," said Robinson.

When Robinson and Tummino reached Japan, they discovered the middle part of Robinson's wheelchair was still in New Jersey.

"I have always felt on the bottom rung of American society being African and disabled, but when I went to Japan I realized just how privileged I am," Robinson said.

When the conference began, Robinson said she was very glad to be there.

"Just seeing all those people in that room from every place you've heard of and some you haven't, made the last 36 hours worth it," Robinson said. "The most fun I had was having breakfast everyday with a diversity of people that wanted to find out about Americans."

"Able-bodied people need to step up. They need to do what needs to be done," Tummino said. "They need to take some responsibility."

According to Robinson, people need to educate themselves by reading about the issues. She said that people should start with the small things like calling their legislative representative.

During the conference, Robinson said she met a delegate from Uganda who worked for the only disabled school in Uganda. Next week there will be a table in the Campus Center accepting donations of school supplies for this school.

SGA to discuss more budget cuts

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

After a visit from Chancellor John V. Lombardi and a week-long break, members of the Student Government Association Senate will convene tonight for their second to last meeting of the fall semester.

While the Senate committee has been preparing their final motions, members of the SGA have been looking at next semester and what is in store for the University of Massachusetts at Amherst campus.

Interim Governor Jane Swift will be releasing yet another set of budget cuts totaling $85 million dollars. The cuts, which will be made in the next few weeks, are supposed to be more hopeful for the University but members of the SGA are expressing concerns of being hit with another large budget cut.

"Watch the news in the next few weeks because we're expecting to get a letter from Interim Governor Jane Swift to say hello with the red pen," President Dave Carr said. "The states received another $85 million in budget cuts and this year we're lower on the totem poll, but it doesn't mean it won't come at us again."

With last year's budget cuts reaching over $29 million dollars, Carr explained that if the University faced more large cuts, the positive energy and morale would be lost on campus.

"It sucks and I'd rather not think about the negative, but if it happens it would be catastrophic, and at this point last year it was hell," Carr said. "We've preached about the positive changes and I think it would kill a lot of people's respect and positive energy, but we haven't heard anything yet."

Aside from more possible budget cuts, members of the Senate have also been discussing the recent implementation of the UMass Police Department watchdog. Max Members of the SGA expressed concern about a miscommunication between the SGA and the Administration regarding the purpose of the newest member of the UMPD staff.

"We just got a police dog named Max and we were told that the dog was on campus to track perpetrators and that the dog would be able to follow someone's scent if attacked," Speaker Dan Saunders said. "But the Boston Globe recently did an article and the school targeted the dog to be on campus to find drugs. If that's the case I'm very scared to be having dogs going through sniffing people's dorm rooms. I've lived here three years and it would make me feel very uncomfortable and it would make me question if I want to live here anymore."

Saunders also said that aside from being used to find drugs on campus, the dog would be breaching students right to privacy in addition to bringing up more issues surrounding the closed-door policies.

"The cameras outside are University space and I don't question that, but I'm pretty heated about this and I hope that we can change this if it's true," Saunders said. "It really sends a bad message to the state. If drugs are really that big of a problem on this campus, then that is a larger issue that needs to be discussed within the University. I have been here for three years and I've never seen a problem despite that large bust a few weeks ago, but I'm going to talk a lot more about it in Senate."

Saunders and Carr both explained that they would be meeting with members of the Administration. Housing Services and the UMPD to discuss the purpose of a police dog on campus.

"We requested a meeting with Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Joanne Viney, Police Chief Barbara O'Connor and Housing Services to figure out what the dog is here for," Carr said. "We've been under the impression it was for sniffing out predators and we would never had said yes to it otherwise and if it's not, then that's a problem."

Senators will be looking closely at the newly released alcohol task force information, produced by the Administration. A possible motion may be put forth, pending the Senate's reactions to the information that will be released tonight. Members of the University Policy committee met to discuss the alcohol task force yesterday evening as well as other pending motions.

"A lot of motions will be coming out of committees, but many of them will be on the agenda next semester due to time and school," Saunders said. "Also there are a lot of motions that are still in committee and next semester I think people will really be able to see how the SGA has been working hard to represent students."

The SGA Senate will meet tonight at 7 p.m. in room 174 of the Campus Center.

President Bulger summoned

By Phil Cannaday
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – University of Massachusetts President William M. Bulger, who has maintained a steadfast silence about his fugitive mobster brother, must decide how to respond to a congressional committee subpoena summoning him to testify about his infamous sibling.

Bulger's attorney, Thomas R. Kiley, said yesterday he was "looking at all our options" after the House Government Reform Committee issued the subpoena instructing Bulger to testify about James "Whitey" Bulger.

Meanwhile, reports published Tuesday said Bulger testified before a grand jury that he has been in contact with his fugitive brother since the mobster fled Boston nearly eight years ago.

William Bulger, the former state Senate president and one of Massachusetts' most high-profile public figures, said he spoke with his brother over the phone in January 1995, according to a copy of his testimony on April 5, 2001, obtained by The Boston Globe.

Bulger, who testified under an immunity from prosecution, said the phone call at a friend's house was prearranged and that his brother was seeking legal advice. He said he didn't urge James Bulger to surrender to authorities "because I don't think it would be in his interest to do so," according to the transcript cited by the Globe.

Bulger, 68, said he does not know where his brother is hiding.

The Boston Herald, citing an unidentified investigative source and the transcript obtained by the Globe, also reported Bulger had been in touch with his brother since the mobster fled.

A call to Kiley Tuesday morning for comment about Bulger's grand jury testimony was not immediately returned.

The Boston office of the U.S. Marshals Service delivered the subpoena Monday afternoon to Kiley. It requires Bulger to testify at a hearing in Boston on Friday.

"I don't think there's any course to quash the subpoena," said Blain Rethmeier, a committee spokesman. "If Mr. Bulger does not appear on Friday, he runs the risk of being held in contempt of Congress."

The committee's chief lawyer, Jim Wilson, said over the weekend that the committee would issue a subpoena "because Mr. Kiley was so emphatic in his message that Mr. Bulger will not appear" at the hearing.

The committee has not revealed what it will ask Bulger, but he could be questioned about what, if any, influence he had with law enforcement while his brother was an FBI informant.

The committee originally scheduled Bulger to testify at a hearing Thursday in Boston, but added the Friday hearing when he said a scheduling conflict prevented his appearance earlier.

The committee, chaired by Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind., scheduled the hearings as part of its ongoing investigation of the Justice Department's handling of mob informants. It has trained its sights on the relationship between Boston FBI agents and the hit men and mob leaders they cultivated and sometimes protected from prosecution for crimes as serious as murder.

Documents released to the committee indicated such relationships were known to FBI headquarters in Washington.

James Bulger, 73, fled in 1995 just before he was indicted on racketeering and extortion charges. He has since been indicted on additional charges related to 18 murders, and is on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list.

During the trial earlier this year of retired FBI agent John Connolly, confessed hit man John Martorano testified that William Bulger asked the FBI to protect his brother.

Martorano testified that when Connolly asked William Bulger what he could do in return for his help in a youngster growing up in the same neighborhood, the reply was: "Just keep my brother out of trouble."

Bulger has denied that claim. He has publicly discussed his brother on only a handful of occasions, including a few paragraphs in his autobiography.

Saudi Arabia announces new preventative measures

By Barry Schweid
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) – Saudi Arabia went on the diplomatic offensive Tuesday, announcing new measures to deny funds to terror groups and disputing allegations it has done a poor job in keeping the money out of terrorists' hands.

The State and Treasury Departments immediately issued statements complimenting the Arab kingdom's efforts and muting calls by the White House last week for the Saudis to do more.

But Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla., chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said "the Bush administration and the Saudis have done a masterful job of turning attention away from ... the trail that leads to the possibility that a foreign government provided support to some of the Sept. 11 hijackers."

Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., said the Saudis had cooperated "some, probably begrudgingly."

Shelby, the senior Republican member of the Senate committee, called on U.S. authorities to find out whether the royal family funded terrorism "either directly or indirectly."

The senators referred to an investigation by the FBI into reports that contributions by a Saudi princess who is the wife of Bandar bin Sultan, the Saudi ambassador to Washington, may have indirectly helped two of the men who participated in the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks in New York and Washington.

The unusual campaign by the generally withdrawn oil-rich monarchy was waged by Crown Prince Abdullah's foreign policy adviser, Adel Al-Jubeir.

Speaking before cameras at the Saudi Embassy not far from the State Department, he depicted Saudi Arabia as a victim of an outrageous campaign that "borders on hate." Roundly denouncing al-Qaida as a terrorist organization, he said Saudi Arabia was a target of Osama bin Laden, the Saudi expatriate and reputed mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, and was the first nation to freeze al-Qaida's assets, in 1994.

The fact that 15 of the 19 alleged hijackers were Saudis was an attempt by al-Qaida to give the attacks a Saudi face to try to drive a wedge between the United States and Saudi Arabia, Al-Jubeir said.

"We believe that our country has been unfairly maligned. We believe that we have been subjected to criticism that we do not deserve. We believe that people have been misinformed about Saudi Arabia and what Saudi Arabia has done, or frankly that people have lied about what we have done or what we allegedly have not done," he said.

A report issued at the embassy said Saudi Arabia had set up a high commission to oversee charitable groups and had barred transfer of assets from one bank to another in cash.

"We've pursued terrorists relentlessly and punished them harshly," Al-Jubeir said.

More than 2,000 terror suspects have been questioned, and more than 100 are in detention, the Saudi official said. The report said three al-Qaida cells had been broken up and 33 accounts totaling more than $5.5 million had been frozen.

In all the investigations, Al-Jubeir said, "we have not found a direct link between charity groups and terrorism." Last week, the Bush administration disclosed that working groups through the U.S. government were considering ways to tighten controls on the flow of money to terrorists worldwide.

Ari Fleischer, the White House spokesman, said, "The president believes that Saudi Arabia has been a good partner in the war against terrorism, but even a good partner like Saudi Arabia can do more."

The U.S. drive is being undertaken with great care. The administration wants support from Saudi Arabia in the event of war with Iraq.

"We are really very happy with the effort," Treasury Department spokeswoman Michele Davis said of Saudi oversight of donations to charitable groups.

Similarly, Philip T. Reeker, a State Department spokesman, said monitoring donations was an important step to counter terror and "the United States is encouraged by Saudi efforts and will continue to provide technical cooperation to Saudi Arabia and other allies in the region." Reeker said U.S. and Saudi officials would meet in Washington next month to "formalize" cooperation in countering terrorism.

Asked if the administration was still calling on the Saudis to do more to stem the flow of money to terror groups, Reeker said, "We always look to do more, not only in Saudi Arabia but in our own country."

Shoulder-mounted misslies

A reminder of terror

Every now and again, citizens in the United States tend to forget how much our lives were changed by 9-11. They forget the way that we were targeted by a group of people intent on spreading terror and confusion in the way we live our daily lives.

So when a reminder presents itself as to why the leaders of the United States have opted to continue fighting the "War on Terror," it should be announced loud and clear, with neon lights flashing.

The attempted downing of an Israeli jet over Mombasa, Kenya last week should serve as a reminder to all of us how little has changed in the way we should be living our lives since the first few months following 9-11.

As long as there are groups who feel the need to make a point by firing shoulder-mounted missiles at an aircraft full of innocent civilians, the urgency cannot diminish—every last American citizen is still at risk.

Patrick Bar-Avi of Rafael, an Israeli military and research firm, told CNN that it is relatively easy to target commercial airplanes, especially during take-off and landing.

"Thirty kilometers away from where we're standing, the plane is still vulnerable, very vulnerable," Bar-Avi said. "Almost like sitting ducks. Those aircraft are very slow, very bright. All the lights are on. Everyone can [attack them]."

Before 9-11, finding ways to protect aircraft from shoulder-mounted missile launchers would have seemed ridiculous. The majority of the population would have looked at the task as costly, unnecessary and not a priority.

The American population needs to stay focused and to realize that it is still a priority, even if September 11th is more than a year removed.

The botched missile attack has been linked to none other than Al-Qaeda. Combined with the suicide bombing of the Mombasa resort hotel that Al-Qaeda has taken credit for, and it is very clear that the United States still very much has a war on its hands, whether it wants it or not.

Thankfully, even if part of the public does not realize or want to acknowledge that, several American leaders have.

"There are thousands of these surface-to-air missiles around the world," Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Alabama, said to CNN. "You can buy them, and you can transport them. A lot of them are not as accurate as others. But eventually, that's going to be one of the methods for the terrorists."

The United States has begun to look for ways to protect aircraft. Transportation Security Administration spokesman Robert Johnson told CNN that his agency began looking into the problem months ago. These measures include but are not limited to exploring a way to adapt missile deflection systems that the military uses for its helicopters.

It hasn't yet been determined if the group, which also includes UMass alumni and current director of New York State's Office of Public Security James Kallstrom, heading the effort will be successful or not.

But it's about time that the American government noticed a problem ahead of time and is trying to make steps to address a problem before another catastrophe occurs.

McKENDRY

As a rule, reading assignments are usually not as enjoyable as picking up a good book just for fun. In high school we had a program called "outside reading" where you had to read one book per quarter. Even then, when you could pick from a teacher's list, or find some who would let you choose almost anything you wanted, the pleasure known as reading seemed like just another mundane task.

First quarter of my senior year in high school, I decided to read two extra books for some bonus credit in English, as I desperately needed it. One night at the Hayerhill Public Library, while looking for something easy to read (remember, I was trying to maximize my reward while minimizing my suffering!), I came across an autobiography in the young adults section. The book, Ryan White: My Own Story, was standing on top of the bookcase as a display, rather than just mixed in the stacks.

Quickly my mind went to work on trying to remember who this teenager was that was on the cover staring back at me. I vaguely recalled reading an article in People Magazine when I was much younger about how he had died, and I was pretty sure that it was AIDS that had ended his life. Beyond that though, I was as clueless as could be.

I glanced the book over, decided it would not be too much of a challenge, and checked it out, determined to make it one of my extra two books that quarter.

I began reading it on a ride home from school on Friday. I got through about the first 30 pages and was actually enjoying it. The next day, around when I had to volunteer at my church youth group's ham and bean supper, I went back to the book whenever I had a free second. I found that I couldn't put it down. I had to keep learning more. I stayed up until almost 2 a.m. that night, absent of television or music, just reading page after page, cause I needed to finish the book. It still ranks as a personal record for the quickest time I've gone cover to cover.

A few days after I was done with the book, I realized that I did more than just finish another story. I had read a book that changed my perspective on life. It made me sit back and think about how precious everyday ordinary events are. It made me re-examine certain aspects of spirituality. It did more than just move my English grade from a B+ to an A.

As the story of Ryan's life takes place in the late 1980s, before most of us were heavily following the news, I'll give a quick recap of the events I'm talking about.

When AIDS first became widespread in the early part of the decade of decadence, screening for the disease was difficult. Rare today, although still possible, transmission of the disease through blood transfusions was an all too common tragedy in the early years of AIDS. Hemophiliacs, people whose blood does not clot normally, used a product, Factor VIII, which allowed them to lead normal lives. Unfortunately, Factor VIII, and the process with which it was made, pooling the plasma from many different donors, became a death sentence, but at the same time a lifesaver. Generations of hemophiliacs, were brought down by AIDS through this method.

Ryan White was one of those hemophiliacs. Rather than sitting around waiting for AIDS to take its course, he chose to try to live a normal life as best he could. When he attempted to return to school in Kokomo, Ind., he was unwelcome, as many locals treated him as if he had been infected by the plague. Numerous court cases and battles ensued, largely in the public eye that ultimately resulted in Ryan, his mother Jeanne, and his sister Andrea moving to Cicero, Ind., where he was more accepted. He lived there the last three years of his life, succumbing to the disease in 1990 on Palm Sunday. It had been approximately five and half years since his diagnosis.

> "If you think about dying, you're going to die. If you think about living, you're going to live."

Friends have told me that they can't understand how reading the autobiography of someone who loses out in the end can be uplifting. They simply don't get it. This book is the most inspiring piece of writing I've read. In his own words, it tells the story of an inspirational young man who was dealt an awful deck of cards but played them like he had a royal flush.

Every person he met felt privileged to have known him. Ted Koppel declared that, "Ryan's life was a compelling reminder...that struggle against overwhelming odds can be an inspiration in itself." Senator Orrin Hatch stated, "if all people faced with difficulties had the courage and the dignity and the grace that he [Ryan White] had, this country and this world would be a lot better place in which to live." Elton John, who said that Ryan White was "a miracle of humanity," claims that meeting Ryan helped him turn his own life around, forcing him to give up drugs and sober up.

Regardless of the fact that I never met him, I too feel that Ryan White helped change my life. Until I read this book, I had also lived my life with a fear of death, the belief that the Grim Reaper would be waiting for me just around the corner. Witnessing a person for whom death literally was just a moment away, live his life to the fullest potential possible, finally helped me deal with my fear of dying. I decided that death would come at its own time, and my job was to enjoy the life I had in front of me. In Ryan's own words: "If you think about dying, you're going to die. If you think about living, you're going to live."

This Friday Ryan White would have turned 31 years old. He always thought that if he could bang on long enough, a cure would be found in time. In early 1990, he told his doctor, less than a month before his death, that he was tired of fighting. Now nearly 13 years later, with World AIDS Day earlier in the week as a reminder, this disease is still ravaging our world.

I'd be lying if I said that I live every minute of my life with the philosophy of just enjoying the moment, it's an incredibly difficult thing to do. But every now and then, when I'm whining about how unfair my life is or what challenges I'm facing, I realize that my life isn't so bad at all. Rather than wasting my time complaining about life, I should get out and enjoy living life.

For many Americans, Ryan White helped put a face to the awesome illness of AIDS. He did more than that though. For every person he met, every soul who has read his words, Ryan, in his short 18 years on earth, displayed how one truly should live out the gift that is life.

As I am about to sit down and enjoy this book again for a third time, I can pause and finally publish say what I've been feeling for the past five years: thanks, Ryan.

Myths about the Restroom Revolution answered

MITCH BOUCHER

Going to the bathroom. We all have to do it. Yet the simple act of using a public restroom becomes a daily challenge for many transgendered people or others whose gender expression does not conform with cultural norms.

Recently, Restroom Revolution, an organization started at UMass by trans students and allies, has proposed that we designate some bathrooms and shower facilities on campus as gender-neutral. Some people consider this issue a joke. Others express concerns that all-gender bathrooms would jeopardize women's safety. Many people feel that during these times of budget crises, money should not be spent to accommodate just a handful of "confused" students. I'd like to address these concerns, and clear up some misconceptions about the restroom revolution.

First, let me begin by giving you a quick conceptual framework for the term "trans-gender." While we are taught to believe that a person's gender is determined by their biological sex, this is simply not true for many people. Biological sex, gender identity and express, and sexuality are separate identity categories, even if they influence and sometimes intertwine with one another.

Thanks to feminism, we have come to understand that gender roles (such as the type of job a person can perform, or whether or not a man can be nurturing and a woman assertive) are not determined by then biological sex. The gay, lesbian, and bisexual movement, in which transsexual people have always had a significant role, has taught us that a person's sexual orientation is not determined by biological sex either. Men can be attracted to other men or to men and women, for instance. Now the trans movement is helping us understand that gender identity and gender expression is not "naturally" connected to one's biological sex. Male people can identify as women. Female people can identify as men. And both male and female people can see themselves as somewhere in between the categories of man and woman.

Trans-gendered students are subject to harassment and embarrassment in sex-segregated bathrooms and many trans students on campus would rather "hold it" all day, avoid classes that require the use of a locker room, or travel all the way across campus to use the Stonewall Center bathroom rather than enter a sex-designated facility. Of course, students who live on campus have no choice but to shower in bathrooms that the University assigns to them based upon their biological sex. This is problematic for trans students whether or not they are taking hormones and/or undergoing surgery to change their physical appearance. It is a safety issue, as well as a workplace issue for RAs, grad student employees, faculty and staff whose gender expression or identity does not conform to cultural norms.

Next, I want to make clear what the Restroom Revolution is proposing. Restroom Revolution does not propose that all bathrooms become designated as gender-neutral spaces. We propose that one bathroom in each building and one bathroom/shower facility on every fourth floor of every dorm be changed to all-gender spaces. This does not take away sex-segregated facilities from those who prefer them. These bathrooms would not be designated as "trans-gender bathrooms," they would simply be marked "restroom" or some other similar term.

All-gender bathrooms would have benefits for everyone, not just trans-identified people or for those whose gender expression does not conform to cultural norms. People who need an attendant to use the bathroom (such as people with disabilities) would benefit since their attendants are sometimes of the "opposite" sex. Parents who have children of the opposite sex could accompany them into the bathroom. Finally gender-neutral bathrooms can be added convenience for everyone who chooses to use these facilities.

The most common argument I hear against all-gender bathrooms on campus is that it compromises the safety of women. People fear that rape will increase if some bathroom facilities are open to people of all genders. While I respect this concern and the need for safe space for women (including trans women), I do question two assumptions: that bathrooms are extraordinarily dangerous places for non-trans women, and that gender- segregated bathrooms are safer than gender neutral bathrooms.

Most assaults on non-trans women are not done by strangers. Many happen in the person's home or the home of a friend or acquaintance. While some assaults on non-trans women do happen in bathrooms, violence against women will not be eradicated by having gender-segregated bathrooms. The female symbol on the bathroom door does not keep out potential attackers. In fact, all gender bathrooms could actually provide more safety if carefully constructed, since it would be a more public space and make it less likely that a woman would be alone. Moreover, this issue becomes a moot point in relation to the proposal that already established, single stall facilities simply be marked as "restroom" instead of "men" or "women."

Finally, some people hesitate to support all-gender bathrooms because of privacy. I have heard women say that they don't want to see men standing at a urinal, and I have heard men say that they don't want to be standing in front of a urinal when women enter the bathroom. In order to address this concern, usually all-gender restrooms are either constructed as single-stall facilities or are set-up with multi-stalls, each with a locking door for privacy.

There are many universities that have multi-stall, gender-neutral bathroom and shower facilities. Hampshire College has gender-neutral facilities in all of their dorms. Reed College in Portland, Oregon has almost exclusively gender-neutral bathrooms. Stanford University, University of New Hampshire, Reed College, Hampshire College, Harvard University, and University of Chicago are just a few others.

Some people argue that providing some all-gender bathrooms on our campus would make UMass unattractive to donors, alumni and prospective students. I think that UMass has the opportunity or be a leader by joining the other universities across the country that recognize the need for and benefits of gender-neutral facilities. The SGA's recent resolution of support and Ed Kammerer's courageous advocacy for this support is a step in this direction.

Letters to the Editor:

To the Editor,

I am writing in response to Johnny Donaldson's editorial "Acting Out Against Activism" that appeared in the December 3, 2002 edition of the The Collegian. I am disturbed by Mr. Donaldson's voracious abhorrence of the idea of activism on campus and throughout the country when clearly the world would not look the way it does with out critical thought and action to change the status quo.

The birth of our nation was a bloody and violent one, instigated because the system in place was unfair to all involved except those in power. If letters to Washington or Adams disliked the idea of changing the status quo to improve their lives, we might still pay homage to the Queen of England like our neighbors to the north. Fortunately for us, these visionaries organized the people of early America and fought for and won their freedom.

From the labor movement, civil right movement, women's liberation movement, environmental movement, the United States would be a very different place if it were not for people who were concerned about the world and people around them. It is a slap in the face to those who have put their lives on the line to make the United States the superpower it is, working for equality, justice, and a better world in which to raise our children.

Mr. Donaldson also criticizes student involvement and activism on campus. His critique is counterproductive to the idea of the University, which initially was to encourage students to think critically and discuss the world around them, to become civically engaged in our democracy and to even protest, if necessary.

Unfortunately, the mission has slowly changed to one that trains students how to be good employees, and as result, students have become less interactive and thoughtful about the issues concerning them. It is vital for students and universities to not only teach students how to succeed in the workplace, but also to challenge them to think critically and act upon injustices they may find.

Though it might not always be clear, students involved with activism and/or protests are deeply concerned about specific issues, enough so that they sometimes put their lives on the line. I applaud them; they are the true patriots – they take advantage of the rights and privileges that our forefathers fought and died for in order to make the world better. Some tactics might not always be the smartest way to create social change, but at least these "activists" and "protestors" care enough to speak their minds though words and actions. In a time when students and the general public are becoming, and are even encouraged, to be less civically engaged, it is refreshing and inspiring to see people active in the world around them. I would encourage Mr. Donaldson to question why people object or protest; he might learn something.

To the Editor:

I would like to respond to Robert Carey's article "Choking on Tofu Burgers." I would first of all like to congratulate Mr. Carey on being the only person who writes for this paper to display their ignorance in such a way that I would take the time out of my busy schedule to respond. I have never in my life seen a more uninformed, self-justifying piece of garbage printed in a newspaper. I wish to present three reasons for being a vegetarian/vegan in the hopes that this blind ignorance does not go on.

First, meat is bad for you! Human beings are born with the stomach acids, saliva, fingernails, toenails and teeth of an herbivore, not a carnivore or an omnivore. Even if you are unwilling to accept these facts, meat is still bad for you. I don't know who these emaciated, tired dying vegetarians that Mr. Carey talks about, but all of the ones that I know are perfectly healthy (and I think that I might know a few as I work at Earthfoods Cafe). In fact, Heart Disease, the leading cause of death in our country is virtually non-existent in vegetarian non-smokers. Furthermore, the majority of physicians agree that the largest contributor to colon cancer is the consumption of meat. I could go on but will move on.

Secondly, the animals that the majority of Americans eat are treated horribly. Farm animals do not come from the mom n' pop farm of old. The "stupid turkeys" that Mr. Carey speaks of were most like packed into a tiny cage with 10 others like them, their beaks ripped off and their legs and feathers sticking out. They stay like this until they die, so others like Mr. Carey can consume them. To say that all industry is evil is a very sorry excuse for accepting this (by the way I do my best not to buy anything that comes from sweatshop).

Carey said in his article, "because most believe that by being a vegan they're more enlightened than the rest of us. That in some way they're more sensitive and in tune with the rest of the world around them." Well, perhaps there is a reason for this...perhaps Mr. Carey is simply acting in anger to that which he does not understand. Perhaps.

Don't get me wrong, I don't hate meat eaters. I have friends who are meat eaters. And while most of them will be displeased to read this article, I doubt their protein-saturated minds and clogged hearts will be up to challenging me to an actual debate. I wish that I had the time to write more and provide references but I have to get back to eating rice and beans all day so that I do not pass out.

A System that breaks genres

Okay, ladies and gents. Listen up.

Although I do enjoy being incredibly negative and criticizing rock 'n' roll's every single move, I'm going to try something different. Now this doesn't happen overnight, you know. Something inspired me to be positive, and I think that this "something" is going to allow the rock genre to move around a little, and maybe even invent a sub-genre. Other sub-genres of rock include grunge, classic, alternative, metal, etc. There's one band that was first considered metal, now alternative, and probably something entirely different in the near future.

Ever hear of System of a Down?

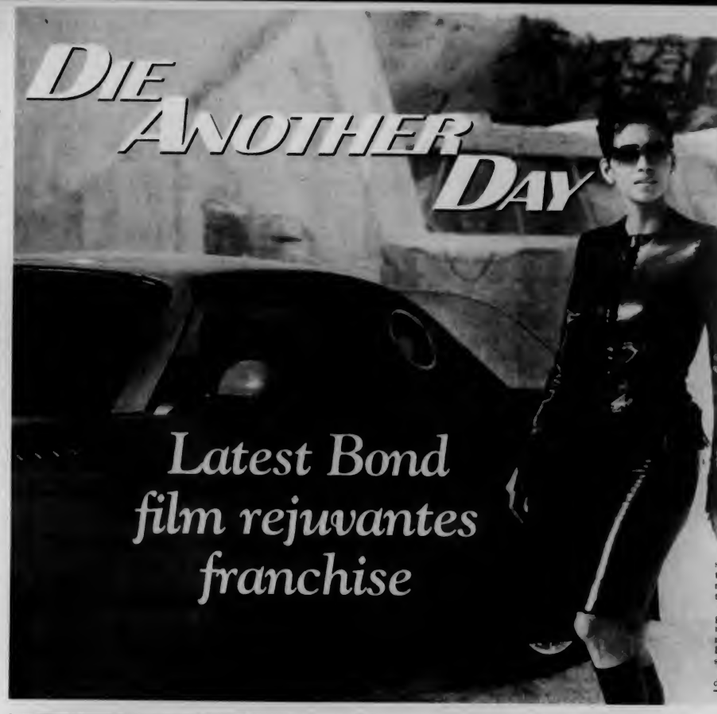
Well, guess what? After weeks and weeks of criticizing the fact that rock has been repetitious and boring, I finally think that there's a band who is going to break the mold and allow rock to finally regain its luster and get back to where it belongs.

System of a Down is compiled of lead vocalist and keyboardist Serj Tankian, guitarist and background vocalist Daron Malakian, bassist Shavo Odadjian, and drummer John Dolmayan. This Armenian quartet is based in Los Angeles and was formed in the mid-90s by Malakian. He also happens to write all of the lyrics and music for the band, which is something that the average rock fan expects that the lead singer should do.

How do I know all of this? Well let me tell you, it's not from researching. I'll get to that in a couple of paragraphs.

System's latest, Steal This Album, was released Nov. 26 on Epic Records. Although all the songs that the band originally wrote for the album were rejected, they decided to polish all of them up, rather than start from scratch again. I honestly think that this will be the band that will allow rock 'n' roll to take a much-needed detour, rather than travel down the straight, long, boring road that it has been for several years.

I first noticed System of a Down last June at the K-Rock Dysfunctional Family Picnic at Jones Beach Theater on Long Island, which is an annual New York radio station concert that featured such bands as Korn, Papa Roach, Incubus, Jimmy Eat World, and a few others. System of a Down was the last to perform after a concert that had been going on for nearly 11 hours. My friend and I wanted to leave, but we decided to stick around. So here we were in the front row amazed by what was going on in front of us. Malakian was a psycho and a guitar genius on stage. He would not stop running around, and there was absolutely no pause in their music set. It was sort of like an opera. The lyrics were very intelligent and addressed serious political, social and economic issues, much like those of Rage Against the Machine. Tankian's voice was similar to that of a man performing an opera. So, here we have vocals similar to an opera, hard, metal guitar riffs, and all chaos on stage. At one point it felt like we were watching a Broadway show.



So, right after the concert, my friend and I were waved to come backstage by System's road manager. Of course, we ran as fast as we could and asked the manager why we were asked to do this. He simply replied, "Daron, the guitarist, wanted to meet you."

To make a long story short, my friend and I hung out with Daron backstage, on his bus, and then in his hotel room with his managers and friends until 5 a.m. He told us all about how he created System and all about his life. I would love to give you more details, but seeing that I was his "friend" at the time and not a "journalist," that would be unprofessionally inappropriate. Sorry, guys!

So, let me get back to the point. System's past two albums, their self-titled album and Toxicity, have stunned the ears and minds of those who take the time to listen to it. They are definitely on their way to creating a new genre of rock. It's a combination of metal, alternative, and in a strange and awkward way, opera. I also think that it's pretty cool how Malakian is the head of the band, and he's just the guitarist. No one would ever suspect that, and I wouldn't have known if he didn't tell me that.

As a System of a Down fan, and a general lover of rock, I encourage you to take five minutes out of your day and do some research on System. You may not think that they're a big deal now, but I have a gut feeling that they're going to wake rock 'n' roll up from the coma it has been in for the past ten years. I guess we'll see what happens.

DIE ANOTHER DAY
Directed by Lee Tamahori
Starring Pierce Brosnan, Halle Berry, Toby Stephens and Judi Dench
Playing at Cinemark 12 in Hadley

James Bond was not his usual self last week. True, the latest installment of Ian Fleming's conjured secret agent drew the usual fanfare, selling out both evening screenings.

The opening was familiar, as the Tux-clad Brit swiveled in a lens to release a bullet from his legendary PPK pistol. And what followed was almost as predictable – a suitably egregious action sequence involving sun boards, hovercrafts and Southeast Asian bad guys.

An impossible escape, a bunch of explosions and a cheap one liner later, and Madonna's belting out her Die Another Day theme and following the Bond movie textbook right down to the blinding

"Now he goes back to HQ and gets all his cool s—t then goes and kicks the crap out of the bad guys," a supposed aficionado whispers in the background.

Not so fast. What's this? Bond is captured, tortured, humiliated and utterly excommunicated by Queen and country. Twenty minutes into the picture, the dapper double agent is lacking the smooth tux, tongue and tresses for which he is famous.

Instead – in a throw back to Fleming's book series when Bond was consistently thrashed – our hero is tied to a heart monitor, recovering from months of torture and razor deprivation.

Fear not Bond-junkies, the gadgets get their due in Brosnan's fourth installment and John Cleese's first performance as Q following the death of Desmond Llewellyn is nothing less than sidesplitting.

But director Lee Tamahori and producers Michael G. Wilson and Barbara

Galactic craft expert show at Pearl Street

NEW ORLEANS BAND GALACTIC – WITH THEIR MUSICIAN-DRIVEN FUNK MUSIC, AND THEIR LEE ROBY, CERTAINLY KNOW HOW TO GET A PARTY STARTED.

By Timothy Gabriele
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

GALACTIC
Pearl Street
Nov. 19

Being a funk band in the modern music environment has to be an enormously difficult and intimidating task, if for no other reason than that you have to live up to the expectations met by contemporaries like Galactic. Each member a master of his instrument, Galactic can bust out jams that nearly force your a to boogie along and make it look like butter on your breakfast toast.

The downstairs at Pearl Street has dingy bar club written all over it. The bands' equipment cases rest in the corner of the floor area, the bathrooms are foul and have no doors on them, and worst of all there are gigantic pillars directly in front of the stage, blocking the view.

Galactic come from New Orleans where bars of this type and much worse are firmly plinted around every street corner. Down there, rhythm and blues and funk are belted out of said smoky locales daily from a thousand faceless bands.

For five white guys and one soul-drenched black man to emerge from that scene to nationwide fame and esteem is quite a feat. You might just say that going to a Galactic show is like seeing the best home-band New Orleans has to offer. It's like taking a little piece of that city with you and luckily for those of us confined to the blistering cold confines of workaday New England, Galactic has taken New Orleans on the road with them.

"Sight and Sound 2002" may be an inappropriate title for Galactic's current traveling tour. Sure, it would be unfair to dismiss the background murals by artists SKW and Doze and the bands own enthusiastic performance that visually invokes the crowd as much as its music, but "Sight and Sound" brings to mind LCD screens and projections of a big rock show. Galactic, despite their spacey name, are more roots than that. Their performances are driven by solid musicianship and their intrinsic love for the music they play.

This is all derived from their influences. Funk is certainly the most musician-driven music around since jazz and the concentration on the collaborative effort of six guys who know each other well enough to execute a harmonious fluidity, while at the same time maintaining an undeniable tightness, is sure to get the party started. In short, bands like Galactic work hard on stage, but do so with such carefree joy that it seems like they are hardly working.

That's not to say that Galactic relies completely on the past. The soul and early funk of 1960s Stax records was certainly upbeat party music akin to the variety that Galactic delivers. However, that music was fueled by the blood of an oppressed people whose exhilarating release and celebration in music was a social necessity, a bold and assertive cry for freedom. Fortunately, the worst of that period is over, but the current musical landscape finds a stale plethora of joyless pop music, ostracizingly complex jazz, pompously over-embellished and unsoulful R&B, violent hip-hop, and sterile

King Crimson: not a happy thought

By Justin Paresky
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

KING CRIMSON
Happy With What You Have To Be Happy With Sanctuary

King Crimson has been around for quite a while. Founded in 1969 by guitarist Robert Fripp, the band has gone through many changes and has made an enormous wealth of music over the years. However, you wouldn't guess this listening to their newest release, Happy With What You Have to be Happy With. While listening to this thrown-together compilation of attempted originality, one thought came to mind: stagnation. True, King Crimson is a spectacular band that has all but revolutionized the way we listen to music, but this fact only serves to worsen the let down that this record is. Tired guitar riffs and cliche lyrics make this sound almost like a band trying to sound like the old glory of King Crimson.

The first major fault in the record reveals itself in the very song the CD is named for: "Happy With What You Have to be Happy With." In this song, the band takes pot shots at what they see are the bands of today that are letting the music industry fall into repetitive monotony. However, the bitter irony of the song is that while trying to put down other bands, and therefore give their tired-out record credence, King Crimson forgets to work originality into its own sound. Its ravings about the uniformity of music sound like the tiresome rants of a man on the corner screaming that the world is going to end. Listening to this track made me wish I could have been there while they were recording, so that I could have calmly walked in and told them "It's ok, you don't have to be rebellious if you don't want to."

The problem is that the band is trying too hard to live up to its incendiary history, and doesn't realize that rebellion just isn't in fashion any more. Sure, there are still some throwbacks that insist on stirring things up for the sake of stirring things up, but for the most part, people just want good music. If something needs to be said, then say it, but don't be revolutionary when there's no revolution needed.

The second fault in this album is that while trying to capture the unneeded element of revolt of the King Crimson of yore, the band completely left out the very needed element of the ballad. Maybe one of the most distinguishing features of King Crimson is its ability to tell a story through music. While other bands have this ability, no one will ever be able to capture the haunting story of "Court of the Crimson King" like King Crimson. However, not a single track on Happy With What You Have to be Happy With could be considered a ballad. In fact, the tracks that actually have lyrics could be called shallow, and even threadbare. The actual meanings of the songs are lost in painful repetition and a severe lack of thought-out wording. In short, the songs, while plenty long, are lacking in both lyrical and musical content. If you're going to spend ten minutes on a song, then at least give us ten minutes of good content.

Finally, the last let down of this "warm up EP" is that in all, none of the songs really even succeeded in catching my attention. One of the most important elements in music has always been simply the catchiness of a song. When fans heard the legendary opening chords of the Rolling Stones' "Satisfaction," they were hooked immediately. With Happy With What You Have to be Happy With, the magic just isn't there.

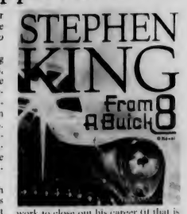
Their Pearl Street set was divided by a short intermission and the intensity only built higher and higher as the show progressed. Bassist Robert McCurdy, guitarist Jeff Raines, keyboardist Richard Vogel, saxophonist Ben Ellman, and drummer Stanton Moore marked each set. In the middle of each set, almost as if it were a special treat (though he is a full-time member of the band and sings vocals on all of the band's albums), veteran soul singer Theryl "Houseman" deClouet came out to warm the already fuzzy-feeling crowd into a dance frenzy.

"Houseman," 20 years older to the rest of Galactic, breathed some sage aural wisdom from the past into their jams and even added a bit more sex where it was lacking. He effortlessly swam through numbers like "It's All Behind You Now" and "Start from Scratch" with the invigorating power of his bandmates in a way that most people old enough to be my father would not dare.

Their cover of "Whole Lotta Love" sassed up the Zeppelin classic in a way that Robert Plant was on too many drugs to even consider. It was as if Tower of Power was doing the song based solely on a cover version that the Meters had produced. "Houseman" shook across the stage during the musical interludes in the stiffest yet most alluring manner since the moonwalk days.

Other tracks culled from the band's musical knowledge of country, blues, hip-hop, and acid jazz, such as the closer to the first set "Mail," a dark disco boogie that brought out the blue lights and built to a nearly excruciating climax. The allotted solos to each member were all stunning and not superfluous in the least. Thanks to Galactic's fine craft at composing transitions, none of the solos stopped the momentum of the show or seemed like a veiled indulgent ego-booster.



Perhaps, the thing that most modernizes Galactic's sound and thereby allows them to live up to its name is its love of effects. Vogel rung out riffs and phasing bleeps throughout the night and Mercuris was able to transform his bass into a synthesizer at certain points somehow.

The crowd, a diverse range of coffeehouse hipsters, hippies, preppie twenty-something's, club kids, and every one else, ate it up. The house was shaking the entire night with jumping and shaking bodies. And with good reason. They were in the hands of experts.

Final King book a disappointment

By Jake D. Lewis

FROM A BUICK 8
Stephen King
Scribner

After reading the 300-plus-page novel From A Buick 8, one can't help but ask, "That's it?"

Don't get the wrong idea; Stephen King's new novel is a real page-turner and a lot of fun to read, yet the Master of Macabre has stated repeatedly that this was the last stand-alone book he would pen before entering retirement (he plans to conclude his Dark Tower series within the year). King has given the literary world some of the most frightening reads (Carrie, The Shining, It), many tear-jerker dramas (The Green Mile, The Shawshank Redemption, Stuttd by Me) and even an effort on how to become a successful author with his insightful On Writing. With a career that's spanned so many years, genres and demographics, one would think he'd go out with a bang, but From A Buick 8 is closer to a whimper.

Curt Wilcox is a Pennsylvania State Trooper who is suddenly killed in the line of duty, making his son, Ned, look into the mysterious circumstances of his dad's death. His curiosity is piqued when he discovers a classic Buick Roadmaster hidden in a shed behind the police barracks. The unusual car sparks the trooper to unfold a story to Ned about the vehicle's haunting past and the supernatural role it might have played in Curt's demise.

At this point in his career, King can't help but write a novel without thinking in the back of his mind that it might possibly be turned into a movie. Accordingly, the chapters are done in such a manner that the story keeps going back and forth between present-day and past tense flashbacks when the Buick was in its heyday. Such moments told in the present tense are unnecessary for the most part; most of the important events occur in the past, and it should've been left that way. The moments when something important happens here-and-now are few, taking place mostly towards the end of the novel which would be appropriate as it is King, however, keeps these random all-hours brief and makes the rest of the book move at a frantic pace. It might not make a great movie in its current state, but it would be better if it was thinned down to a 200-page novella, a la King's The Girl Who Loved Tom Gordon from 1999.

There are some truly frightening and, dare I say, poignant moments, in From A Buick 8. Regarding the former, the appearance (and subsequent amateur dissection) of an otherworldly creature is described in some truly stomach-turning passages. One particular scene about the mangling of a german shepherd is so nauseating that you're laughing because you can't believe what you're reading.

It's hard to imagine that with such a campy and frivolous storyline as this one about a possessed car, that King could effectively tie in some philosophical thinking. There's an underlying message in the novel that our society will go to any extreme to get answers to life's greatest mysteries. From A Buick 8 will certainly not spark any fierce debates among book clubs, but it is an interesting idea that King doesn't get too carried away with the gore to include some sort of message.

Sure, the story slightly resembles one of King's earliest works, Christine, and it may not be his best work to close out his career (if that is indeed the case), but at least he knows when to call it quits. The past few years haven't been kind to King; both the near fatal car accident that he was involved in, and the quality of his works going slowly downhill must have taken some toll on the author. It's time for him to take a break and his fans understand that more than anyone. Of course, we'll always keep our fingers crossed that it was all just a joke, and wait to see what his talented and twisted mind might come up with next.

Broccoli take an alternate angle to get to the bolded down good vs. evil conflict, making for a more satisfying experience.

Bond is on the run for most of the first half of the movie, adding juice to a story that's been dried out in recent episodes. He's an outcast from MI6, (the British Secret Service) and he's wanted by the CIA, all while hunting the man who set him up.

Fortunately, Die Another Day retains many of the characteristics that make the series great.

Exotic locales in Cuba, Korea and Iceland provide a salivating backdrop for a duly ludicrous plot by baddie Gustav Graves (Toby Stephens) to bridle the power of the sun into an all-powerful weapon.

Graves' playboy front for maniacal villainy finds him throwing the verbal and physical gauntlet on 007. The pair engage in one of the more memorable duels in modern movie history as a reserved fencing match turns into an intense sequence that spans every crook in an English high-brow club.

The swordfight could only be outdone by the breathtaking car chase that has Bond tooling around an endless sheet of ice in his Aston Martin – complete with cloaking device and ... you'll have to wait and see.

And what's Bond without it's voluptuous heroines. Halle Berry and Rosamund Pike are the flavors of Die Another Day. Berry is admittedly entertaining as American agent Jinx, but not enough to warrant the undertones of a spin-off series.

While Pike as Graves sidekick Miranda Frost is an easily detestable character until she strips her midriff for a final scrap with Berry.

Even with the plot shakeup, the cliches, action sequences, sexual innuendos and unchecked machismo, the film remains intact for what is arguably the best Bond on Bronsan's resume.

THERE'S A MANDATORY ARTS MEETING TONIGHT IN THE COLLEGIAN OFFICE AT 5:30 P.M. ANY INTERESTED WRITERS ARE WELCOME TO ATTEND.

Vermeil may have cost Holmes NFL record

Coaches like to see their players break major records. Don't believe them when they deny it. If a coach has a player who has repeatedly gone to the mattresses for them, they enjoy seeing them earn accolades.

This is why I was shocked to see Kansas City Chiefs coach Dick Vermeil bench running back Priest Holmes early in the third quarter after his team had jumped out to a 42-0 lead over Arizona. I understand that Vermeil didn't want to leave his starters in and risk injury or show up the Cardinals, but he may have single-handedly ruined Holmes' chance at NFL immortality.

Holmes, who scored two touchdowns earlier in the game, has 22 touchdowns on the season. With four games left in the schedule, he needs five touchdowns to break St. Louis running back Marshall Faulk's record for scores in a season. If Priest stays in the game, he could have scored one or two more touchdowns, giving him a much better chance to set the record. Now, he needs to score more than once in each of the final four games. At the rate he's been going, that should be no big deal, but you never know.

Vermeil may have screwed over his own player.

OAKLAND RAIDERS' JERRY RICE (80) EVADES NEW YORK JETS' CORNERBACK AARON BEASLEY (21) TO SCORE IN THE THIRD QUARTER MONDAY, DEC. 2, 2002, IN OAKLAND, CALIF. IT WAS THE RECORD 198TH TOUCHDOWN CATCH FOR RICE, AND IT IS 7 TIME OVER 1,000 YARDS RECEIVING IN A SEASON FOR THE RECORD 14TH TIME. THE RAIDERS WON THE GAME, 26-20.

My fantasy team

Lonesome Sundays completed one of the greatest turnarounds in fantasy football history in nailbiting fashion this week. With a mediocre 13-point lead heading into Monday night and no one left to play, I had to sit and watch as the Oakland defense crept the opposing team, Rusty Aries, closer and closer to my 192 points. As the game drew toward the final whistle, it looked as though I would get away with a six or seven point win, but the Raiders managed a sack and an interception in the final three plays of the game to cut the win to just 192-191.

So after starting out 2-5, my team finished the regular season 8-5 and in first place. Just one problem. I think my chances in the playoffs were hurt by the win, because the fourth place team that I have to square off with next week is playing much better than the third place team.

Hopefully this won't spell another year of playoff doom for me. I don't think I could handle it.

If this was college football...

Here is how my top 10 would look (there are only eight because if this was college football, the BCS's eight teams are the only ones that would matter):

1. Oakland (8-4) – Fine, the Raiders can hold onto the top spot for this week. Hopefully I'm jinxing these guys. I've been making old timers jokes all season with these guys, but in honor of their placement here after beating the Jets, I'll hold off for this week.

2. Tampa Bay (9-3) – A 23-20 loss to division rival New Orleans this week showed that the Bucs aren't the best team in the league. Now they have to worry about winning their division, as the Falcons (8-3-1) and the Saints (8-4) are right on their heels. If they don't bounce back and kick some you-know-what against the Falcons next week, they could quickly find themselves outside of the playoff hunt.

3. Philadelphia (9-3) – Philly knocked St. Louis out of the playoff hunt, which will always get you on my good side. But the fact that the Eagles did so with third-string QB A.J. Feeley (who really sounds like he should be a racecar driver) shows that this team is much more about defense and running the ball than I ever thought.

4. Atlanta (8-3-1) – Michael Vick is amazing. He ran the ball for roughly 6.7 million yards Sunday in an overtime win over the Vikings. Vick scored on it 46-yard jaunt in the extra frame to end the game. Next week's game against the Bucs will help show who is in charge of the NFC.

5. Green Bay (9-3) – The Packers won without stud running back Ahman Green, who was knocked out with a knee injury after he produced over 120 yards of offense. Backup Tony Fisher replaced him with a 17-carry, 91-yard performance. Green Bay's win over Chicago made them the first team to clinch its division.

6. San Diego (8-4) – The Chargers got a big 30-27 win over the Broncos Sunday behind a terrific 220-yard rushing performance by LaDainian Tomlinson. San Diego has struggled of late, winning just three of its last six (all in overtime), but Sunday's victory will likely get the team straightened out. Hopefully, they'll knock off No. 1 Oakland at home this week-end.

7. New Orleans (8-4) – The Saints ended a two-game skid with a big 23-20 win over Tampa, last week's No. 1. Now they have just Baltimore, Minnesota, Cincinnati and Carolina left. Think they won't win at least 11 games?

8. Pittsburgh (7-4-1) – If Tommy Maddox wasn't coming back, I wouldn't even put the Steelers on the list. But since he is returning this week, I think the Steelers are a lock to make the postseason. Much like the Saints, they have a very easy remaining schedule (Houston, Carolina, Tampa Bay, Baltimore) and should run away with their division.

Gimme pick of the week

Buffalo over New England – I don't like making this pick, but maybe the awfulness of last week's miss (St. Louis over Philly) will carry into this one. I just don't see the Pats stopping a hot Buffalo offense, especially with their trouble stopping the run. Never mind that New England has been trying to give the last few games away. This time, they are going to run into an offense that can take advantage.

Take the Bills and the points.

The race for Byron Leftwich, Maurice Clarett, or whoever else...

It's amazing what Cincinnati is doing right now to get the first overall pick. Up two games in the win column at 1-11, the Bengals held a 23-14 lead over one of the worst offenses in the NFL, the Baltimore Ravens. And, because of this team's hard work and dedication, they managed to give up not one, but two touchdowns in the fourth quarter to lose 27-23.

At least they stopped a two-point conversion.

receiving a concussion diving for the goal line against Villanova

As the prize bull in Amherst, the last thing UMass Head Coach Mark Whipple wanted to see was Jeff Krohn diving head first for the corner of the end zone. But that's exactly what he got as the fervor that had built in the capacity home crowd turned to an eerie hush as No. 7 remained down for the count. It was an injury that kept Krohn from competing in the second half and nearly cost the Minutemen the game. Its true ramifications, however, would be felt at a more inopportune time as a second head injury kept the star signal caller out of critical late-season contests (both losses) and left Whipple and the Maroon and White faithful to wonder, "what if?"

In what turned out to be the season's most memorable game, the Minutemen played "can you top this?" with the Wildcats until safety Anton McKenzie provided UMass with its most clutch play of the season.

Having recorded what should have been the tying touchdown on a one-handed catch by Brian White on fourth and goal, the 'Cats would see the tying extra point hit the left upright off the foot of kicker Adam James, and possession returned to Day, and the Minutemen needing only to run out the clock to lee a 17-16 victory. In a play that was never designed as a pass: Day made a colossal rookie mistake in firing the pigskin directly into the arms of Nova's Gary Johnson. After a defensive stop by the Minutemen, James again trotted out – this time for the win. McKenzie broke through the middle of the Wildcat line and halted the kick dead in its tracks, sending the sideline and the home crowd into jubilation. It was the team's second upset of a top five team in as many weeks, and surely marked the high point of an up and down season.

1.) True freshman quarterback Tim Day is sacked deep in Hofstra territory with just seconds remaining, allowing time to run out in a 31-28 showjob

After becoming the beneficiary of a phantom offsides non-call, Hofstra quarterback Ryan Cosentino capped off an impressive performance with a go-ahead touchdown pass to Marques Colston, giving the Pride a 31-28 edge with just 2:18 to play. The Maroon and White faced the daunting task of driving the length of the field in a driving snowstorm in an attempt to tie or win the game.

After Day hooked up with Neal Brown to move UMass into Pride territory and completed a desperate fling to Adrian Zullo on fourth down, the Minutemen were knocking on the door of pulling off a most improbable victory. After a swing pass to fullback Terrence Glover gained no yards and forced Whipple to call his last timeout, the veteran head coach was left with a decision to make.

With only 13 seconds remaining and no timeouts, he had the option of sending out reliable placekicker Doug White for the tying field goal or turning Day loose for one more play in hopes of avoiding overtime and escaping with the win. Whipple chose the latter, giving Day strict orders to throw the ball away if he didn't find a receiver instantly.

As students lined the fence surrounding the field, waiting for their opportunity to rush the snow-covered playing surface in victory, Day dropped back to pass and, to the horror of those watching, did the unthinkable. He kept looking. Looking. And looking. And then, after scrambling for his life, he did it again. He kept looking.

Those of us who bleed Maroon and White will be forever left to wonder how long he would have kept looking, for he was hauled down by Hofstra's Shaun Kinsley and the only sound that could be heard was that of 11,080 eyes shifting from the field to the scoreboard. What they would see was the final seconds agonizingly tick off the clock, and before they knew it the game, and the season, was over.

to accept it. I remember he came up to me in practice and said, "I know it may not be what I want to do, but I can accept the role."

Just as important as stifling an attack or setting up a play downfield, Rhodes also took the young backs under his supervision, and became a leader. As a mentor to Tim Kitchell, Rhodes taught the freshman important lessons about the college game.

"Having him as my big brother was something I needed," Kitchell said. "I feel I learned the college game through watching him. He's an influence on how I dedicate myself.

"He was always there to tell me what I wanted to know, who to mark. After a while, it was like he already had the answer, and was just waiting for the question. It was nice, because I didn't have to wait to ask sometimes. He was always there, to let us know when we were messing up, or when we were doing well."

Of course, for all the good that he did on defense, Rhodes still ached to slip back to midfield and become an offensive player again. In fact, he almost tried it in a crucial matchup with A-10 foe Duquesne, which ended in a tie after a tense overtime session.

"Coach had to yell at me a lot to stay back, because I wanted to go to the ball," he said. "[He was] making sure that I didn't dive in, because I'm the last one back. My tendency was to be an aggressive player, and go to the ball. The first couple of times, I'd go for the tackle, and they'd get by me, and then we were in trouble. So I just had to concentrate on containing, and not diving in."

While the Minutemen came up short in their bid to repeat as Atlantic 10 champs, coaches and players agree that the only reason they had a shot to be involved in the playoffs was because of Rhodes's presence in the back.

"I think the results of when we moved him back there, and the way the team responded, end of story," Koch said. "It's the biggest difference in our season. He solidified the defense.

"I don't think [senior goaltender] Enzo [Altomare] would have been an A-10 Player of the Week without Rhodes in front of him."

While the emergence of Altomare as the number one goalkeeper and the record-breaking play of Deren were big parts of the Maroon and White's season, the most important part of the team's success was moving a skinny kid from Wisconsin to defense. Of course, when that skinny kid happens to be a competitor like Derek Rhodes, it makes all the difference, as attested by his coach.

"He'll do anything to win. If it meant tackling his grandmother at midfield, he'd do it. I think his desire to be successful, his determination to make it happen, he's probably as good as any player I've had. He just hates to lose. Absolutely hates to lose, no question about that."

DEREK RHODES WAS SELECTED TO THE A-10 THIRD TEAM IN HIS FIRST YEAR AT SWEEPER THIS SEASON.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Changes in routine could be setting the stage for romance. Enjoy the affections of someone who truly cares for you.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – An upward situation eases at work, as shifting politics realign your co-workers into a more cohesive group.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Maintaining a strong sense of humor will help you ride your way past a number of difficulties this week. An obnoxious person may have a hidden agenda that includes making trouble for you.

PISCES (Feb. 19-Mar. 20) – An "iffy" relationship is well on its way to a resolution. Pushing for a certain outcome, one way or the other, could prove chancy, so exercise some patience and restraint.

ARIES (Mar. 21-Apr. 19) – Making commitments comes easily today, and pays off in the form of increased trust and intimacy. Extra understanding is needed for a friend who is hurt.

TAURUS (Apr. 20-May 20) – Spending time with a new group could be the way to put the spark back into your social life. You might even develop a new relationship.

GEMINI (May 21-Jun. 21) – Changes in your financial situation may seem like a windfall at first, but be fully aware of all the demands made on your time. There may be more to the arrangement than meets the eye.

CANCER (Jun. 22-Jul. 22) – Variety is the spice of life but this week you may need a break. Try relaxing with a tried and true routine.

LEO (Jul. 23-Aug. 22) – What seems like an absolute mountain of work clears up more quickly than you expected today. Treat yourself to a night out as a reward.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sep. 22) – A successful event has you flying high as the week begins, but beware of the eventual letdown. Plunge into work to keep occupied.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – If a friend is cranky today allow extra time to listen to what is really bothering him or her. You may have the power to solve the problem.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Any conflicts you encounter today are likely to escalate, so try and steer clear of fights.

Rhodes's move to 'D' key to UMass' title

By Andrew Merritt

Flash back to Sept. 15. Michigan State enters the attacking zone. The forward is preparing to launch [illegible] the does the UMass sweeper surge in, takes the ball and sends it back downfield.

The defender is Derek Rhodes.

"I feel like a midfielder," someone in the fan section said [illegible].

Well, he was. But at the beginning of the 2002 campaign, the Minutemen faced a complicated dilemma on the backline. Amid all the talk of preseason [illegible] Jeff Deren and the talented midfield, there was the issue of a defense that saw its top [illegible] graduate after the 2001 season. Coming into 2002, the backs had just seven games of experience at the collegiate level and the job of defending [illegible] fell in the talented but untested hands of sophomore Jason Scudamore.

So the idea that had rattled around in the coaches' heads during preseason became a reality. Why not stick Rhodes in the back and have him shore up the young defensive corps?

"We were just trying to look at all the different options that we had," Head Coach Sam Koch said. "[Rhodes is] the most vocal leader that we have, and certainly has the most knowledge of how it should be played in the back. He just has a good sense for the game. ... I think mentally he was the right decision. We didn't have too many other options. If we had put any other seniors or upperclassmen back there, they wouldn't be able to play as well."

The decision would change the face of the Minutemen season. With Rhodes behind the half line, UMass streaked to its third regular-season Atlantic 10 title, and it's fourth appearance in the A-10 tournament.

However, Rhodes wasn't happy about the decision at first. In fact, he initially refused to make the move.

"He was doing stuff in practice, and you could tell he didn't want to be there," Deren said. "You could tell by the effort and his decision-making wasn't as good. He'd kick the ball around and stuff ... there were times when you could definitely tell."

"I just remember that he just didn't want to play back there, that was it," Koch said. "He wanted to attack, he wanted to be in the offense. He didn't want to play in the back because it's boring. So it was a constant battle for the first three weeks to convince him that it was the best for the team to have him back there."

After three weeks of working on the young man to no [illegible] Koch even using the idea of getting to the Tournament as fodder for the battle to convince him to take the defense under his wing, he finally relented.

"He wanted to get to the NCAA Tournament so badly," Koch said, "and [when] he realized that that's what it would take, he was willing to do it."

And so, while his first game as the sweeper was a [illegible] 3-0 tie Michigan State ... it was the beginning of a new season for Rhodes and his team. After getting past the small speed bump of being outplayed by one of the better teams in college soccer, the Minutemen bounced back and allowed just one goal in the next four games.

For Rhodes, any discomfort in his new position was gone by Sept. 28, when he scored a goal and an assist in a 6-0 drubbing of Hartford. His efforts earned him the Dinn Brothers/UMass Athlete of the Week award.

"That weekend, definitely, we had two good defensive games," Rhodes said. "We didn't allow them to score, and I also got an assist and a goal. I realized that weekend that I could hold the defense together, that I was the man for the job, and that we weren't going to be as good if I wasn't back there."

Just as important to Rhodes's adaptation was the help he received from his teammates and coaching staff.

"The guys gave me a lot of support," Rhodes said. "They knew I wasn't comfortable, but they knew I was the one holding the defense together, and they were vocal about it, going through the transition.

"[Assistant Coach Dean Smith] was really helpful. [He] played sweeper all through college at BU, so he really helped me about things I wasn't sure about — when to step up, how far, when to push back — that kind of stuff, the basics of being a sweeper."

While it would be a challenge for any natural midfielder to start playing to keep the ball out of the net rather than put it there, it's no surprise that Rhodes, the hardest worker on the team, was able to make the transition.

"His competitive spirit is something I haven't seen anywhere," Deren said. "He'll go out at practice and break your ankles, he works so hard. It can be annoying, but it's good."

For Rhodes, it all came down to what his role would mean for the squad.

"It was basically the question of 'would you rather play sweeper and win, or play midfield and lose?'" he said.

So Rhodes took on the role of sweeper, and arguably became one of the best players at the position in the Atlantic 10. He led the defense to five shutouts, and his impact was felt all over the field.

"It was nice because we knew that if it got by the forwards and midfielders, Derek would step up," Deren said. "He had a lot of poise back there, he wouldn't just kick the ball away."

"Once I moved into the back, you could see that there was more of a comfort on the field," said Rhodes, who, along with Deren, is looking at playing professionally after graduation. "Jeff and [senior] Yuri [Morales] and [junior] Ptah [Myers] and a couple of guys in the midfield, they knew that if they gave up the ball, it wasn't going in for a goal."

Even through the early part of the season, when Rhodes struggled with the idea of moving to the back, he showed tremendous maturity.

"He definitely didn't like it," Deren said. "But once we started our winning streak, he started

Two Bulgers, worlds apart

By Denise Lavoie
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) — They were brothers, born five years apart in a large Irish-Catholic family in working-class South Boston. But their lives took very different paths.

Billy Bulger grew up to become one of the most powerful politicians in Massachusetts. Whitey Bulger became a mob boss.

For most of their lives, their public worlds have been separate. Both wanted it that way. But that has suddenly changed.

A congressional committee has subpoenaed William Bulger — now president of the University of Massachusetts — to testify tomorrow about his fugitive brother, who fled almost eight years ago after being tipped off by his FBI handler that he was about to be indicted.

The House committee is looking into the overly cozy relationship between the FBI and the Boston underworld. But it has not said specifically what it wants to ask the 68-year-old Bulger.

James "Whitey" Bulger, the 73-year-old leader of an Irish mob known as the Winter Hill Gang, is wanted in connection with 21 murders. For more than 20 years, he was a top-echelon informant who fed dirt to the FBI about New England's Italian Mafia.

Those who knew the Bulgers are at a loss to explain how one brother could end up quoting Greek classics while the other could wind up on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list alongside Osama bin Laden.

"They were in two completely different worlds. No one knows why," said Will McDonough, a sports columnist for The Boston Globe who grew up with the Bulgers.

Whitey was 15 when he logged his first arrest, for larceny. After that came a string of arrests for assault and battery and bank robbers.

During those years, Billy was busy studying. He was nicknamed "The Beam" because he could often be seen studying late at night by the light of his bedroom lamp.

While his brother was becoming a lawyer, Whitey was becoming a street thug.

"Everybody feared Whitey, but most people liked Billy," said Gerard O'Neill, coauthor of "Black Mass," a book chronicling the relationship between Whitey and the FBI. "One wanted to read about the world and the other wanted to go explore it. One guy wanted to finesse stuff and the other guy wanted to run you over."

JAMES SCHATTEN/BOSTON HERALD

WILLIAM BULGER HAS BEEN SUBPOENAED TO APPEAR IN FRONT OF A CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE TOMORROW.

When Whitey got out of prison in 1965, his brother got him a job as a courthouse custodian. But Whitey soon went back to crime. Eventually, he took over the Winter Hill Gang, which controlled Boston's gambling, drug and loansharking rackets through intimidation and murder.

In 1970, Billy became a state senator. He rose to the powerful position of president of the Senate. For 17 years, he was known as a leader who ruled with an iron fist.

In 1975, an FBI agent named John J. Connolly Jr. recruited Whitey to become an informant. Connolly, who grew up in the same South Boston neighborhood, is now serving a 10-year prison sentence on charges he protected Whitey and other mob informers while they continued their deadly crime sprees.

Billy was never seen publicly with his brother during that time. Testifying before a grand jury last year, Billy acknowledged that he did not tell authorities about a call he received from his brother shortly after Whitey went on the lam in 1995. Billy said he didn't urge his brother to surrender because he didn't "think it would be in his interest to do so."

On Tuesday, Billy defended his decision not to report the call, saying: "It was a private conversation." He said that it was the only contact he has ever had with his brother since he went on the run, and that he doesn't know Whitey's whereabouts.

He added: "I have a regret always that we were not closer."

The Bulgers have dominated the front pages of Boston newspapers for years. And Billy, the one considered the good brother, didn't always escape the glare of suspicion.

SGA questions decision making of administrators

Purchase of police dog sparks debate and accusations

By Kristin Shrewsbury
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A newly purchased police dog was under discussion at last night's Student Government Association Senate meeting.

The newest member of the University of Massachusetts Police Department prompted questions as to what the University is choosing to spend student's monies on.

The new UMass Police dog, named Max, will likely join the force in February 2003 and is currently undergoing training.

"My new favorite UMass Police officer was in the news," Speaker Dan Saunders said. "I don't know how many times I was told that they were not getting a drug sniffing dog.

"And here it is the first thing in a Boston Globe article about our new drug sniffing dog."

Members of the SGA Executive Cabinet and members of the Senate addressed the issue saying that they felt lied to by the administration.

Saunders further said that if the dog is on campus to sniff out drugs, then it is something the Senate and SGA need to look into.

"We need to talk and see if the drug problems on this campus are that large because this means that there is a larger problem with the culture, Resident Advisors and campus and that is something that needs to be looked at differently," Saunders said. "We've been lied to by the administration, the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Police Chief.

"I'm hoping that someone will say something about this."

Student's questioned the Boston Globe article saying that the UMass on-line news said the police dog was to seek out predators, not drugs.

Saunders said that he believed the Boston Globe at this point instead of a newsletter written by the administration.

"Who are we going to believe? I'm going to believe The Globe especially when it's coming from a source that is written by administrators," Saunders said. "We shouldn't be lied to by them and they should respect us more."

Senators also discussed a recently released Alcohol Task Force recommendation presented by the Administration.

President Dave Carr and Saunders met with the Alcohol Task Force and said that they felt student representation was need in order to make effective decisions regarding alcohol on campus.

"We attend a meeting today about the Alcohol Task Force's recommendations and they suggested an alcohol free dormitory and no second semester freshman living in pre-approved Greek housing facilities," Carr said. "All these recommendations were made without student input and it's hard to understand how anyone could make rules and regulations about our campus when they are all over 60 years old.

"It was really hard to get points across to people who will never see it your way."

The first motion submitted by the Senate and approved by the University Administration was regarding the need for Greek life on campus, and the need to keep Greek pre-approved housing available for second semester freshman.

"One of our first motions passed by the Senate came back from the administration about pre-approved Greek housing and they accepted our enactment and are committed to Greek life and maintaining pre-approved Greek housing," Chair of University Policy Blake Kleppe said. "I know the alcohol task force called for no pre-approved housing but if the administration is working for us maybe we can get their proposal thrown out and get a new task force developed with students because we should have the up most say in that.

"So we are going to be working on that."

The Senate passed three additional motions last night, two of which called for student representation on all search committees composed by the University.

DAVID CARR SPEAKS AGAINST UNIVERSITY OFFICIALS WHO ARE SEEMINGLY MAKING DECISIONS WITHOUT STUDENT INPUT.

"It's hard to understand how anyone could make rules and regulations about our campus when they are all over 60 years old. It was really hard to get points across to people who will never see it your way."
-David Carr

A second motion followed by a request that the administration also grant student's to sit on search committee's for perspective employees of the University.

The Senate passed the motions unanimously.

A third motion presented to the Senate requested that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts take full responsibility for funding the union contracts.

The motion said that it is not the responsibility of the students of UMass to have to increase tuition and fee's as has already been done in order to fund state promised contracts.

"Chancellor Lombardi spoke to us and agreed with these statements and we don't feel that we need to have pay increases to fund their already promised contracts," Senator Tracy Kirschen said.

The Senate passed the motion unanimously.

Task Force ready for initial report

By S.J. Port
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Chancellor's Task Force for the Prevention of Alcohol Abuse on the Amherst campus will present its long awaited first report to the Faculty Senate today in 227 Herter Hall at 3:30 p.m.

The Task Force's report was set into motion last year by the University Health Council. The Faculty Senate voted at that time to establish the task force in support of the Health Council's suggestion, which had direct support from then Interim Chancellor Marcellette Williams. Williams appointed members to the task force immediately to begin work on addressing the issues of alcohol abuse on the University of Massachusetts campus.

Originally, the Task Force was asked to present a report by Jan. 15 2002; however, according to their report, the group found it impossible to meet this deadline due to the "magnitude of long-standing alcohol-related issues." The group states in its first report, to be presented to the Senate today, that they felt a need to discuss the complexity of the issue with various constituents including on and off campus students, key administrators and the faculty.

In their report the task force states that the University must take the first steps towards recognizing the importance of attitudes towards alcohol and their relation to achieving the University's mission.

"It is reasonable to conclude that, if our mission includes the promotion of civility and the creation of a productive learning community, the alcohol culture on our campus must be a responsible one that does not hinder the accomplishment of these ends."

Preventing alcohol abuse on campus is important, the report concludes, because for a majority of students education is the "most important investment of their lives" and that the campus environment is a decisive factor in determining their academic and personal success at the University.

"Alcohol-related distractions disrupt the learning process not only for the individuals directly related but also their fellow students," says the report. "Further, the consequences of alcohol culture on our campus must be a responsible one that does not hinder the accomplishment of these ends."

The Task Force notes in its report that even a "modest" amount of alcohol abuse can have "disproportionately negative effect on civil discourse and behavior" and that this is especially dangerous for a publicly supported institution of higher education.

Members of the task force researched not only the University's history of alcohol restrictions, privileges, attitudes, and abuse but the issue at a national level comparing our own alcohol issues with those at other colleges and universities.

According to the report "alcohol abuse is a deeply ingrained public health problem at colleges and universities in the United States." The report lists data to support claims that the attitude towards alcohol in the United States is a destructive and widely spread health problem. Members of the task force are asking university leaders to realize that they should not wait until the national problem is solved before they tackle the issues on their home campuses.

"Leaders of colleges and universities who are even minimally effective in attacking alcohol abuse and its consequences on their campuses realize that they cannot wait until the wider public health problem is solved. The local campus environment resulting from a risky alcohol culture not only makes abuse potentially destructive for individuals, but it also creates unfortunate opportunities for serious negative consequences for all member of the learning community," the report states.

Listed in the report as examples of "uncivil behavior" that the task force believes are "usually initiated by students who have abused alcohol" are last year's celebratory riots following the New England Patriot's win at the Superbowl, the "Hobart Hoedown" and "Northeast Streak Night," as well as other miscellaneous instances of assault and vandalism.

The task force stresses that changes in the administration provide the "necessary resources for continuing the work of an ongoing task force and implementing the long and short-range recommendations advanced here."

Suggestions that the task force have made include specific directives they would like to see take place on campus to change the "negative aspects of the alcohol culture of our community...and reduce alcohol abuse and the related negative outcomes."

Indonesia arrests bombing suspect

By Leli T. Djuhari
Associated Press

JAKARTA, Indonesia (AP) – Indonesia has arrested the alleged operations chief of an al-Qaida-linked terror group blamed for bombings on the resort island of Bali, the nation's police chief said Wednesday.

The arrest of Mukhlas, alias Ali Gufron, was a major blow to Jemaah Islamiyah, which has been implicated in a string of terror plots against Western targets in Southeast Asia, officials said.

Mukhlas was taken into custody Tuesday near the central Javanese town of Solo, along with eight other people, including his wife, police chief Gen. Erwin Mapaseng told reporters.

All those detained are being questioned over possible links to the Oct. 12 Bali bombings, police detective Aryanto Sutadi said. The blasts killed nearly 200 people, mostly foreign tourists.

Ali Gufron, or Mukhlas, is an important figure in the group Jemaah Islamiyah," Sutadi said. "We have been looking for him for a long time."

Sutadi said one of those detained, identified only as Hermianto, was believed to have arranged accommodation for the bombers in Bali.

Police also confiscated a pistol, mobile phones and Islamic extremist propaganda during the arrests, Sutadi said.

Last week, police said Mukhlas was believed to have replaced Riduan Isamuddin, also known as Hambali, as operations chief of Jemaah Islamiyah. They said that Hambali was becoming too well known and had been forced into hiding.

Hambali has been described as al-Qaida's point man in Southeast Asia.

Mukhlas has been identified as a brother of Amrozi, who was arrested last month in connection with the bombings. Amrozi confessed to owning the car used in the attack and buying materials for the bomb, officers said.

Police have not named Mukhlas as a suspect in the Bali blasts. Regional intelligence officials say he was involved in planning the attacks.

Police have also arrested Imam Samudra, who they have identified as one of the masterminds of the attacks.

At least 28 people have been arrested in connection with the blasts. Police say Amrozi and Samudra are the only ones with a direct role. None have been charged.

Also detained is the alleged spiritual leader of Jemaah Islamiyah, Abu Bakar Bashir. He has not been named a suspect in the Bali bombings, but he was arrested after the attack, and was accused of masterminding a string of church bombings in 2000. Bashir denies involvement in those bombings and claims Jemaah Islamiyah does not even exist.

Indonesia's defense minister, Matori Abdul Jalil, has said Bashir's close ties with many of the Bali bombing suspects leads him to believe the cleric also was involved in that attack.

PRESIDENT BUSH GESTURES AS HE FIELDS REPORTERS' QUESTIONS AT A BILL-SIGNING CEREMONY YESTERDAY IN THE ROOSEVELT ROOM OF THE WHITE HOUSE IN WASHINGTON. BUSH SAID YESTERDAY HE BELIEVES OSAMA BIN LADEN'S NETWORK WAS INVOLVED IN LAST WEEK'S KENYA ATTACKS.

Bush fingers bin Laden for attacks

By Ron Fournier
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – In a grim update on terrorism's global reach, President Bush said yesterday he believes Osama bin Laden's network was involved in last week's Kenya attacks, and he complained that terrorists have been able to "stop the peace process" in the Middle East.

Pledging anew to fight terrorism "wherever it exists," Bush sidestepped the question of whether bin Laden's al-Qaida organization has infiltrated the West Bank, but said terrorism in general has left its mark on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"I am concerned that terrorists have disrupted the ability for peace-loving people to move a process forward," the president told reporters in a brief exchange about Iraq and the war on terrorism.

Bush said he understands both Israel's need to fight terrorism and the Palestinian people's desire to improve their living conditions. He pledged to continue working on both fronts.

"But the net effect of terrorism is to not only stop the peace process, but is to cause suffering amongst all the people of the region," Bush said.

"And that's why our war against terror must remain steadfast and strong wherever terror exists."

Since the first days after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on Washington and New York, Bush has said the war against terrorism is a global proposition. His remarks Wednesday indicated he believes the Middle East peace process will be in jeopardy until terrorism is curbed.

The remarks were made in advance of a Dec. 20 conference in Washington to plot peace moves in the Middle East. Even as they prepare for the summit of U.S., Russian and European diplomats, administration officials concede there is little chance for headway in the talks amid violence and terror attacks in the region.

Bush was asked whether he is concerned that al-Qaida, feeding off the harsh plight of many Palestinians, may be gaining a foothold on the West Bank.

"I am concerned about al-Qaida anywhere," the president replied. "I believe that al-Qaida was involved in the African bombings in Kenya. I believe al-Qaida hates freedom."

Evidence continues to mount that al-Qaida was behind the Kenya attacks — a bombing at a hotel frequented by Israelis and the firing of missiles at an Israeli charter flight.

Experts said Monday the missiles had serial numbers similar to those on one involved in an attempted hit on a military plane in May, and al-Qaida has claimed responsibility for the hotel attack.

U.S. officials have suggested that an affiliated Islamic extremist network from Somalia, al-Itihaad al-Islamiya, may have played a role in the Kenya attacks.

"I believe al-Qaida will strike anywhere they can in order to disrupt a civil society," Bush said. "That's why we're on the hunt."

Bush answered questions during a White House ceremony for a new law designed to make the Internet safer for children.

Afterward, spokesman Ari Fleischer said Bush was not making a definitive statement about al-Qaida's link to the Kenya attacks. "He's sharing with you suspicions you've heard from previous quarters," Fleischer said.

On Iraq, the president said that Saddam Hussein "is not somebody who looks like he's interested in complying" with a U.N. resolution forcing him to disarm.

Question 2 amendments must be approached carefully

Potential changes and amendments to the much-discussed bilingual education law are once again blowing in the wind.

Although Massachusetts voters overwhelmingly voted "Yes" in the Nov. 5 elections – thus choosing immersion through English-only classes over bilingual education – a representative from western Massachusetts is raising interest in legislation that would allow school districts to maintain some bilingual classroom environments.

Rep. Peter J. Larkin (D – Pittsfield) is pushing to augment the law with the caveat that those students with limited ability in English be allowed some instruction in their native language.

In an interview with The Berkshire Eagle, Larkin, who acts as the House chairman of the Education, Arts and Humanities Committee, backed the motives that have brought him increasing amounts of public criticism.

"On Nov. 5, people said they want English taught in schools, and we agree, that is clear," Larkin said. "I don't think anyone who voted on that issue knew what structured English immersion is as opposed to two-way bilingual education. What it said was students should learn in English."

That Larkin's initiatives are being met with contention comes with little surprise. While the majority of the public did exercise its right to speak – by heading out to the polls and voting – and supported the passing of No. 2, there was still significant sentiment against the legislation, particularly amongst the student population and media (The Collegian supported the movement against No. 2 in an Oct. 30 editorial).

And we still do, though Larkin should take caution to tread carefully and not force or hurry the issue.

He can't pretend the vote didn't happen – agree with it or not – and should allow the new initiative some time to work its way out.

One option? Use the time to diagnose weaknesses, flaws and other shortcomings – then take the steps to counter the legislation based on those observations.

Larkin has also said that his bill would ultimately create a greater sense of accountability for bilingual programs than the original ballot initiative offered – under Larkin's eye, each school district would be provided the ability to design an English Language Learners program that districts could choose from to meet the needs of each student. It's points like that that Larkin needs to nurture and emphasize – one bill can't accommodate everyone. Discussion of specific needs, then, distills the discussion down to a more manageable size.

While governor-elect Mitt Romney has promised to forge ahead with English-only education, Larkin's most substantial opposition may prove to be himself – his approach in the next few stages of garnering support for the bill is vital in terms of public opinion. Whether that opinion is in favor or against will speak volumes on how far his initiative goes – if it gets off the ground at all.

9/11 investigations: waiting for the punch line

MARK OSTROFF

Think about this:

Two planes slant into two towers, killing thousands of people. A third plane is in the air for almost an hour on a cannonball course to Washington DC with nothing to stop it, not even the most powerful air force in the world. A fourth plane drops out of the sky with pieces of the engine ten miles down the road. As of today, there has been no formal investigation of why or how all this happened.

As the BBC and the Guardian began revealing pre-9/11 neo-conservative war drafts and blueprints of bureaucracy gutting, American news outlets had become nothing more than a tear-choking sideshow, allowing emotions and Patriotic fetishism to take precedent over hard facts and unanswered questions.

With the release of books like "Forbidden Truth," as part of America's new truth-movement, groups like Truthout and Unanswered Questions had become a popular alternative to the spoon-fed information of typical American media outlets.

As the debate for a 9/11 investigative commission heated up, the Bush administration had opposed the measure with the generic excuse of undermining the War on Terrorism. Dick Cheney even went as far as to comment that democrats who were making such inquiries were "unpatriotic." However, no matter how unpatriotic it seemed, the questions remained to be answered.

In an attempt to tranquilize the masses that began to inquire not only about the oddities, but also the absurdities of 9/11, the Bush administration hastily assembled a commission, naming Henry Kissinger in charge of the tainted investigation. The commission was started only after the Homeland Security Bill, with all its provisions, was passed. This bill is one of the reasons why this investigation is corrupted.

For example, one of the bill's provisions is designed to shield liability to airport security companies. While originally thought to be an innocent case of corporate protectionism, this provision will make it impossible to conduct an adequate investigation into security slip-ups and possible infiltration. Most of these companies are independent foreign entities with American contracts, and now that they are free from liability, have no obligation to cooperate in the 9/11 investigations.

There are more ways that this investigation has already been derailed. After Bush's executive perestroika in the name of protecting the Homeland, will there be any investigation into the FBI or CIA, considering most of the messing up was on their part? Will the Pentagon be investigated on why it failed to carry out its hijack protocol in which there was no air interception attempted at Washington for almost an hour? There probably will be, but expect Kissinger to ask more questions to the night janitors than anyone else. Even if he conducted as thorough an investigation as possible, it will be too little and too late anyway.

"I've seen car accidents with longer investigations than 9/11."

The investigation of 9/11 is given only 18 months to finish its work. Now, consider this: it took almost an entire year for Ken Starr to make his case about the affair between Bill Clinton and Monica Lewinsky. That was a simple land in retrospect, absolutely absurd case of perjury.

Now, we are investigating a case of the largest breach of national security in the history of the United States. If you want to discuss priorities, the government spent months analyzing a stained dress. They're going to give it just six more months to come up with answers to a myriad of inconsistencies and murder in the homeland. (How patriotic?) I've seen car accidents with longer investigations than 9/11.

The gent of this investigation is Henry Kissinger himself. Kissinger, who came to the US from Nazi Germany in 1943, is one of the many new appointees to the Bush administration with questionable backgrounds. To let Kissinger investigate a massive-scale homicide, risking the accountability of the government, would be like letting Ariel Sharon investigate Israeli war crimes. Frankly, if he were a civilian, filling out a gun permit application, he would have a good chance of getting rejected.

Kissinger is especially known for his involvement in what the Pentagon would call the "collateral damage of soft targets" – or, in English – 600,000 dead peasants from "secret bombing" missions over Cambodia in 1969. In the Nixon years, he exonerated himself of accountability, claiming that the Cambodians had actually killed each other instead.

Overall, would it be unpatriotic to ask the president what he plans on accomplishing with a fruitless investigation, run by a rumored war criminal?

Actually, there are plenty of questions to ask Bush. I wouldn't mind asking Bush about his very exorbitant business dealings with the bin Laden family in the past 10 years.

Or am I just being un-American?

ROISSANTS also originated in Vienna and their refined in better quality foods for the Fewer One upon a time there was a group of angry men organized an invasion of Vienna through tunnels, which would lead them into the cen- ing to before the army had time to prepare. Discovering of the invasion, the bakers of the made preparations their breads and heard the battle sound of a massive legion munching through town. Quickly the army was alert and was stopped and Vienna saved

Incidentally, the coffee beans and brewers left behind supposedly introduced coffee into the region, but the Crusades are a stronger probability.) The crescent shape of the pastry is reminiscent of the Turkish flag, and all the city bakers were allowed to use the precious white flour and butter necessary for the delicate flaky layers. Prior to this decree, only the royal families bakers were allowed to bake with white flour because of its expensive due to the rigorous grinding process and the peasant class was left with rye.

BAKLAVA is perhaps the most famous of Mediterranean desserts. Yeah, I know, you were all thinking it involved goat meat, but no. The almost impossibly sweet dessert was created in the land of Assyria, 16th century B.C. and was also a dish served only to the rich. Greek sailors brought the pastry back to their country and enriched the flavor by rolling the layers into thin sheets called "phyllo." Armenian and Arabian spices began to influence the flavor of pastry and during a period in exile, Marie Antoinette's head chef developed the method of folding the dough into a more appealing dome shape.

MACAROONS became popular in the 18th century due to a group of Carmelite nuns who needed to pay for a hiding place during the French revolution. The original recipe for the cookies contained almonds, but coconut is more common in the United States. In any event, the most important part of the cookie is that it remains crisp outside and chewy inside. When baking, the nuns based the recipe on the nutritional maxim, "Almonds are good for girls who do not eat meat." During their period of hiding, two nuns made and sold the cookies in a town called Nancy, on a street called Macaroon and earned themselves the names the Macaroon sisters.

So whether we eat them out of sick compulsion or festive celebration, the power of an elegant piece of sugar cake can still sway the most svelte among us. And since this is pretty much the last article before winter break I just want to say thanks to the readers who've enjoyed this little culinary romp. I hope every one has a safe and happy holiday season.

Mos Def and Talib Kweli collaborated on an album called Black Star in 1998. At the time, the two high school friends from Brooklyn, N.Y. were both well-known underground artists, but had only released 12-inch singles.

Mos Def had more notoriety for his appearances on various native tongues projects such as De La Soul's album, Stakes is High, and the Bush Babies album, which included beats supplied by producers such as Ali Shaheed Muhammad. Talib Kweli had released a single under the group name Reflection Eternal, whose members included Cincinnati D.J. Hi Tek.

Black Star quickly found praise from underground heads and respect from mainstream audiences, and soon after, Mos Def released his groundbreaking solo debut Black on Both Sides, while Talib Kweli began completion of his Reflection Eternal album. A year later, Kweli's album received praise from underground and art-orientated fans. However, it did not gain the popular appeal of Mos Def's.

Quality is Talib Kweli's first true solo album, and some music critics wrote of concern in Kweli's ability to hold his own. At first listen, Quality shoots down this guesstioning as the album provides top notch production from notable heads like the Anatollah, J Dilla, Kanye West (whose work on Scarface's latest album places him as one of the top producers in the game), Dave West, Megahertz, Soulquarians, Da' Hood, Jay Assyria, 18th century B.C. and was also a dish served only to the rich. Greek sailors brought the pastry back to their country and enriched the flavor by rolling the layers into thin sheets called "phyllo." Armenian and Arabian spices began to influence the flavor of pastry and during a period in exile, Marie Antoinette's head chef developed the method of folding the dough into a more appealing dome shape.

The album shows Kweli's serious growth as an artist and as a man since Reflection Eternal; he has secured a special place in hip hop history.

Scratch and even D.J. Quick. All this sets the foundation for Kweli's thoughtful and in-depth lyricism and makes the album just as good – if not better – than his last. With each song, Kweli reaches listeners through his soul and feeling.

Kweli's songs touch on many different topics, ranging from his personal life and dreams for the future to social commentary and political statements. The first track, "Rush," serves mostly as an introduction affirming the listener will get a rush when hearing the album. The track leads to Kanye West's first song on the album, "Get By," where Kweli tells of what people do to get through their daily lives (including drugs and drinking.) Kweli's lyrics challenge people to do more than just get by – to actually live and enjoy life – and make a difference.

The album progresses with one great song after another. It ranges from hanging joints like "Gun Music" featuring the Ocean Brown (formerly Smif n Wessun) to the radio-joint featuring Bilal, "Waiting For the DJ," a song where Kweli tells of seeing a beautiful woman while performing on stage – seeing a woman who makes him feel a role reversal, as if he was the audience waiting for the D.J. to "make your body rock."

Mos Def teams up with Kweli to provide backing for "Iva," where Kweli looks to his two children, his jos and inspiration, and speaks of his parental role and of all parents' responsibilities to their children. Kweli calls for parents to stop being "baby mama's" and "baby fathers" and become adult mothers and fathers.

The following track teams up Kweli with Bilal once again allowing Bilal to helps him along as he speaks to his wife about what he expects from their relationship. This is a true love song and brings a feeling of old 70s Motown. Bilal sounds so much like Smoky Robinson, the listener almost feels swept into a time warp. All the while, Kweli adds his own contemporary flavor to the song, making it unique to his own style.

After two consecutive soft songs, listeners are left wondering the next track to follow is also soft, as its first few chords indicate. However, the surprise hits when the beat thrusts into what is quite possibly the hardest track on the album. "Guerrilla Monsoon Rap," featuring Black Thought of the Roots and Pharoahe Mönch (formerly of Organized Konfusion), showcases lyrics from some of the greatest emcees of our time over a banging Kanye West track. Still with a head bobbing from the rap, the listener heads out west with "Put it in the Air," as D.J. Quick drops a signature beat and adds a very different backing for Kweli's lyrics.

"The Proud" is probably one of the most heartfelt, emotional songs to arrive on vinyl. The track sweeps up listeners with the grit and raw truth in its warnings of things to come. Kweli touches on the situations in our countries leading up to and after Sept. 11 and talks of Timothy McVeigh and his death – of Muslim scapegoats. Politics, corruption and murder and Sept. 11 touches on all races. He also reminds people of the true intentions of the president and the difference between dying for the people and for the flag.

Kweli then dedicates his "Where Do We Go?" to recently deceased musicians Wolfie Devine, as he and female vocalist Res pen the what people can do to make change happen. Kweli somewhat answers his questions on the following track as he states "one must either get with change and caravan or Stand to the Side." Again, an incredible female vocalist, Vinia Mojica, who has appeared on both Kweli's Reflection Eternal album and on Black Star and is more notably on the 1991 classic Low End Theory with A Tribe Called Quest's "Verses from the Abstract," aids him in this track.

Quality winds down with two more incredible tracks, one produced by Kanye West "Good to You," which Kweli uses how his music is good to its listener and the sweet, soulful, Dave West produced "Won You Stay," where Kendra Ross-Jill her feeling out into the beat. Two lovers her each time you go away, so baby won't you stay with me tonight." Kweli talks about the complex dynamics of love and relationships and of maturity between lovers making this a definite classic.

The album shows Kweli's serious growth as an artist and as a man since Reflection Eternal; he has secured a special place in hip hop history. Those who have enjoyed anything from Kweli or Black Star in the past will be pleased with this album. Some may feel it falls short of classic status, but nit-picking it to pieces, but the tracks evoke a contemporary classic and without doubt one of the best releases in hip hop and in music this year.

■ Extreme Ops

The opening scene that has the characters kayaking down white water and over a large fall leaves gives the audience some hope of future attention grabbers. Once again, no such luck.

The most stimulating action in the middle part of the movie is two skiers and snowboarders routinely cruising down a mountain as practice before they are filmed in front of an avalanche – unless of course you count real action as legendary snowboarder Silo (Joe Absolom) performs a stunt off a roof that blatantly requires a zip chord or the absence of gravity.

It says in the Ops press kit that Absolom knew at age 10 he wanted to become an actor. Last word is he still wants to.

It's hard to believe that anything can outshine Ops' acting and stunts as film making atrocities, but for that purpose, we look at the movies plot. Hint: there is none.

First of all, it takes over an hour to find out who the actual villain is. (You can imagine what goes on for that first hour.) And when we finally find out that an Internationally Infamous terrorist who supposedly died in a plane crash is coincidentally hiding out in a resort on the same mountain that our heroes are filming a commercial at, nothing happens.

The maniacal Payle (Klaus Lowitsch) spends a good amount of time observing the heroes do a whole lot of nothing. But to the viewer, it doesn't feel like the meat of the movie starts until it's over.

The final chase scene (which is at least bearable) simply brings a frustrating feeling of "finally" on the audience. Finally the people have a scene to enjoy. Finally there is a piece of the movie that's done right. Then it's finally over. F (Paramount Pictures; rated PG-13 for violence/peril, language and some nudity; 88 min.)

With the win, the Minutewomen improve to 4-1 on the season, their best start since the 1993-94 campaign, when they went 4-1 en route to a .500 season. The Catamounts, meanwhile, suffered their first loss, dropping their record to 4-1 as well.

The two halves might as well have been two separate games, as the opening frame saw both teams struggle from the field. Vermont held the edge at the line and threes from Boardman, but both sides missed numerous scoring opportunities, and it appeared that the winner would be the team that didn't play itself out of contention.

In the second half, the Minutewomen, who had struggled all night to get the ball inside to Butler, finally began to break down Vermont's defense, leading to seven of Butler's points, including five from the line.

Still, a microcosm for most of the night came at 17:30, when sophomore Katie Nelson stripped the ball, and sent it downcourt to Pegues, setting up a long jumper that Pegues missed.

The Minutewomen countered, however, finally getting the ball to Smith, who came up big trine points, three rebounds in the second half) when Butler was forced to sit with four fouls.

As for the Catamounts, they fell victim to the rhythm of the game, as well as fatigue.

"We played some players lot of minutes, and down the stretch it caught up with us," UVM Head Coach Keith Gieplicki said. "I liked our defense tonight. My theory is that if we hold somebody to 53 and we can't win, I don't think we can worry too much about our defense.

"I don't think you can hold somebody to 18 and be happy being up only four at the half."

inside and she was finding people and we got some great looks, but we were one and out every single time down the floor," UMass Head Coach Marnie Dacko said. "But in the second half, we were making the extra pass and Jen was getting to the foul line."

In the second half, Butler continued to receive multiple-player coverage. A fatigue factor began to set in and with nine minutes left in the game with UMass down by two at 58-57, Butler picked up her fourth foul which sent her to the bench.

"I wanted to keep her in with four fouls but my assistants said to pull her so I went with them," Dacko said. "But yut feeling was to keep her in."

After Butler went to the bench, Vermont went on a 6-0 run to take a 43-39 lead.

But in her return to the action with 4:30 left, Butler pushed her finesse game to the side and focused on her workhorse persona. The result was one of the most important offensive rebounds of the season for the Minutewomen.

With 1:48 left in the game and UVM up by two, Nelson chucked up a trifecta from the top of the key. The shot caromed off the front of the rim but underneath the boards, a battling Butler grabbed the rock and put home the lay-up – tying the score at 48.

Butler was a madwoman on the boards, but if she only shot two-for-seven in the game, how was she able to rack up those 11 points? Easy – by following her coach's orders.

No. 21 went seven-for-seven from the charity stripe against UVM, including two clutch free throws with eight seconds left to give UMass a five-point lead and breathing room en route to its fourth victory of the season.

"I talked to [Jen] after the Toledo game and said, 'you have to make your free throws, you are going to be fouled a lot.' And she stepped it up tonight," Dacko said.

Youth movement leads UMass

By Matt Brady
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With the amount of talent that is abundant throughout Hockey East, it is somewhat rare to see two athletes from the same school be awarded Player of the Week in consecutive sessions.

But if you told anyone before this season that that school would be Massachusetts, they might have just laughed you out of town.

But he who laughs last, laughs best.

Grey Mauldin was awarded the conference's top honor for his performance in UMass' three-game sweep of East Coast Athletic Conference (ECAC) opponents. The sophomore scored six points, including his first career hat trick, en route to leading the Minutemen to a combined 18-7 advantage over the three-game set.

And his linemates were no slouches either.

Stephen Werner notched three goals and five assists, and was plus-11 for the week, while fellow freshman Matt Anderson put two pucks home – both shorthanded – in a 7-2 win over Dartmouth and dished five helpers. Werner is now second in the conference among rookie scorers, and leads HE with his plus-15.

The Chevy Chase, Md. native also came in as a runner up for Hockey East Rookie of the Month for November, finishing just behind Maine goaltending sensation Jim Howard.

But the most impressive player on the Minutemen this season has likely been forward-turned-defenseman Thomas Pock. The junior has shown rapid signs of improvement on the blue line, and is behind only Boston College's J.D. Forrest in defenseman scoring. He also was runner up to New Hampshire's Lanny Gare for the conference's Player of the Month.

All this makes for exciting times in Amherst, but most of the questions about this team will be answered this weekend with a home-and-home series with Boston University – a team that the Minutemen have beaten just once since 1993. With the Terriers struggling, though, now could be the time for the Maroon and White to turn the tide. Stay tuned.

FRESHMAN STEPHEN WERNER HAD TWO GOALS AND FOUR ASSISTS IN UMASS' TWO WINS OVER ECAC FOES DARTMOUTH AND PRINCETON LAST WEEKEND.

Terriers seeing Red

The BU-Cornell rivalry is a long, historic one that dates back for years. That being said, the Terriers will likely see this weekend's chapter as one they would like to forget.

The Big Red swept a home-and-home with BU, outscoring their opponents by a combined score of 9-2. Cornell got goals from eight different players, with Shane Hynes being the only player to score a pair in the two-game set. David LaNeveu stopped 50 of the 52 shots he faced, and since has had his name in college hockey conversations across America. The sophomore lowered his goals against average to a microscopic 1.11 and raised his save percentage to .946, second in the nation in both categories to Bemidji State's Grady Hunt.

The Terriers turned upside-just 45 of 51 shots on the weekend, and spotted Cornell large leads early. BU is still ranked at No. 15, but will need to play quite well this weekend to get by a streaking Minutemen squad.

Huskies/Friars skate in northern NY

In the weekend that was essentially the Hockey East/ECAC challenge, a pair of HE squads – Northeastern and Providence – headed west to New York to take on Clarkson and St. Lawrence. The two teams took three out of four games, the lone loss a 4-0 Friars tumble at the hands of Clarkson on Friday.

Kent Gibson, who has struggled for periods this season, stepped it up for the Huskies, allowing only two goals in his 161 minutes of action, earning Defensive Player of the Week from the conference. Last year's rookie sensation turned aside 51 shots in the two games. Good thing he did, as the NU offense could muster just five goals total in the two-game swing.

As for the Friars, they started out the weekend by extending their winless streak to five games, as the potent PC offense was stifled by Clarkson's Mike Walsh and the Golden Knight defense. Providence's top line of Peter Fregoe, Jon DiSalvatore and Devin Rask made some noise where the slide ended, as the trio notched eight points in a 4-2 victory over SLU. Stephen Wood added a pair of games from the blueline to seal the victory.

Each team finishes off its Hockey East slate for the first time this weekend, as Providence heads to Merrimack tonight and NU hosts the Warriors on Saturday.

Mavericks unwelcoming hosts

Merrimack logged some miles on the weekend, but the Warriors showed no signs of jetlag for three-quarters of their trip to Omaha to face Central Collegiate Hockey Association squad Omaha tonight. But the last quarter of the trip was a bumps ride and it forced the visitors to come home with a sour taste in their mouths.

Merrimack scored three goals in both games this weekend, forcing a 3-3 tie on Friday night, but botching a 3-0 lead on Saturday to let the Mavericks cruise to a 5-3 victory. Freshman Matt Johnson scored four goals and posted five points on the trip, earning HE Rookie of the Week honors for his efforts. Joe Exter made 34 saves on Friday to preserve the tie, but Casey Guenther could not hold on, turning aside 31 Maverick shots as the porous Warrior defense opened its doors to UNO.

The Mavericks were the beneficiaries of 13 power plays in the two-game set, cashing in on four of those.

The Warriors face a pair of crucial Hockey East games against PC and NU this weekend.

Trouble in the top five

Hockey East had three of the top four teams in the nation just one week ago, with BC (No. 1), UNH (No. 3) and Maine (No. 4) all having stellar seasons. But all three had non-conference scares over the week, and one of the mighty fell hard.

UNH and Maine survived a pair of nail-biters against Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference foes, while the Eagles were swiped by Dartmouth on Tuesday.

The Wildcats played host to MAAC lowlife UConn in their lone game of the week, and the Huskies played stride for stride with the defending HE Champs, much to the credit of UConn netminder Jason Carey, who stopped 37 of 40 UNH offerings. The Wildcats got a trio of second period goals to put the game away 3-1. Jeff Pietrasiak made 22 saves for the home squad.

Maine suffered a similar fate, finding itself unable to shake MAAC frontrunner Quinnipiac in Orono. Robert Liscak scored with less than four minutes to play to vault the home squad to victory, as Jamie Holden saved 36 of the 38 shots he faced (including 22 of 22 in the first period) as Quinnipiac killed off seven of eight Maine power plays. Frank Doyle made 16 stops for the Black Bears.

Things went less well for the top-ranked Eagles, who traveled to Dartmouth to do battle with the Big Green – a team that is winless on the road but has won every game at home. BC jumped out to a 3-1 lead on Ned Havern's power play goal in the second, but two goals over the next 1:54 put Dartmouth back in it. Both teams tallied a goal in the third, but Mike Ouellette scored the game-winner 2:39 into the extra session to lead the unranked Big Green. Nick Boucher made 36 saves in the contest, while Matti Kaltiainen was sieve-like, allowing five goals on 18 shots.

BC will have a shot at redemption as it hosts a two-game set with the Black Bears this weekend in a series that will have a major impact in both the Hockey East race and the national standings. UNH hosts Clarkson and SLU in a pair of non-conference games.

MassPIRG sets up new system of book return

By Eugene Tetlow
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts Students Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) and the Campus Greens have teamed up to form the Books for Books program, a non-profit initiative that will provide students the opportunity to save money on textbooks and get more cash for their used books.

Students who take their used textbooks to the Textbook Annex receive a maximum of 50 percent of the new book price, and often times will receive less than that. The Textbook Annex then resells these books at 75 percent of the original price.

Laura Kyser of MassPIRG and Matthew Callis of the Campus Greens believed that students were not being given a fair deal and came up with the idea for the Books for Books project. Starting on Dec. 12, and lasting until the end of the finals, students will be able to give their used books to volunteers in the Campus Center Concourse. The books collected will go on sale Feb. 3 (registration day) and will be available through the Add/Drop period. Books for Books will sell used books at 65 percent of the new book price and will give the original owner 55 percent of the new book price. Any books that are not sold will be returned to the owner.

Any profit that the project makes will be reinvested for next semester and will also go towards operation costs. Costs are minimal, but Callis and Kyser, as well as volunteers Amy Baker and Branwen Hardebeck, have invested $80 of their own money to get the program off the ground.

Kyser believes that Books for Books "will become a student run business within two years." They hope that "within ten years, Books for Books will be the largest supplier of textbooks to UMass students."

Callis is more focused on the short-term goal of getting the project off the ground as a "viable alternative" to the Textbook Annex.

One incentive for students to bring their used textbooks to Books for Books is that they will offer 55 percent for any book, regardless of its history and number of previous owners.

It is possible that students could buy a book at the beginning of the semester for 65 percent of the original price and then sell the same book at the end of the semester for 55 percent of the original price. This would result in a minimal amount of money being spent on books each semester.

The Books for Books project has already been established elsewhere. In Cambridge, students at Harvard University purchase the majority of their textbooks at a similar Books for Books project, which has been running for several years. With a little bit of hard work, Callis and Kyser see no reason why UMass cannot follow the example being set by Harvard.

Books for Books is currently in the process of setting up an Internet site where students will be able to check if the books they need are available and for what price. This will make buying books more convenient for students and save them from making trip to the Campus Center if the books they need are not available.

In order for the Books for Books program to work, a large number of students are needed to donate their books to the program. According to MassPIRG, community support from both student groups and student businesses has been promising. Faculty and members of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) have also agreed to publicly encourage their students to use the new system.

The Student Public Interest Research Group is a national network of student groups that work on the environment, consumer rights issues and consumer protection, while training students to be active citizens.

Books for Books will begin accepting books on Dec. 12. For more information go to their website at www.masspirg.org.

Bulger to take stand today

DAVID WHEELER, RIGHT, THE SON OF MURDERED BUSINESS EXECUTIVE ROGER WHEELER, SPEAKS BEFORE A CONGRESSIONAL PANEL IN BOSTON YESTERDAY. THE CONGRESSIONAL PANEL IS INVESTIGATING THE USE OF MOB INFORMANTS BY THE FBI, INCLUDING UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS PRESIDENT WILLIAM BULGER'S BROTHER JAMES "WHITEY" BULGER.

UMass president expected to speak on fugitive brother's activities

By Dan Lamothe
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts President William Bulger will testify today before the House of Representatives Reform Committee, a committee source told the Associated Press yesterday.

According to the source, Bulger sent a letter stating that he will appear, but also asked that the hearing be made private. The source also told the AP that he did not believe Bulger's request was being offered in return for him appearing.

Bulger was subpoenaed to testify on the relationship between he and his fugitive brother James "Whitey" Bulger, who is a center for the Reform Committee's probe into the Federal Bureau of Investigation's use of informants during the 1960s and 1970s. The FBI allegedly looked the other way as informants such as James Bulger committed a variety of crimes.

James Bulger, who has been on the run since the eve of his indictment in 1995, is currently wanted for racketeering, 18 counts of murder, conspiracy to commit murder, conspiracy to commit extortion, narcotics distribution, conspiracy to commit money laundering, extortion and money laundering, according to the FBI.

Nick Mutton, spokesperson for the Committee, said, "They'll be questioning him on the basics of his relationship with his brother."

Mutton admitted there being concerns over whether Bulger would appear to testify.

"The chairman's position is that this is the former president of a state senate and that he has an understanding of what the law is complying with it. We're going under the assumption that the subpoena has been successfully served and that he will abide by its requirement," he said.

According to William Bulger's attorney, Thomas Kiley, the leak of Bulger's 1996 secret grand jury testimony to The Boston Globe makes his appearance at the hearing unfair.

Kiley also told the AP that William Bulger has heard from his brother John "Jackie" Bulger. John was charged with perjury and obstruction of justice last year after he testified that he had not seen James Bulger since he disappeared. Prosecutors insist that James contacted John through a middleman in 1996.

The Congressional hearing was highlighted by the testimony of Jeremiah O'Sullivan, a former federal prosecutor. According to the Associated Press, O'Sullivan said that he knew Whitey Bulger and fellow mobster Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi were murderers and FBI informants. He said that he did not indict them in a case involving the fixing of a horse race because he didn't think there was enough evidence to convict them.

O'Sullivan also testified that former FBI agent John Connolly, Jr. and another agent approached him and asked him not to indict the two mobsters because they were FBI informants.

The University of Massachusetts campus in Amherst, meanwhile, seemed to be taking a wait-and-see attitude towards Bulger's appearance in court.

The Student Government Association held all comments pending Bulger's appearance in court.

"It would be premature to comment until then," Secretary of Administrative Affairs Jason Bissonnette said.

Faculty members offered varying opinions on the ordeal.

Gender bending commentary at UMass

The Mineola Twins is a gender bending commentary on the role of women in society. Taking place through the conformist '50s, radical '60s and gaudy '80s, the play follows the lives of twins Myrna and Myra as they wrestle through three different political decades.

The play is a caricature of the social atmosphere during the different time periods, capturing two different types of women that came out of these decades. Myrna, the good twin, lives in sexual repression, takes shock treatment and becomes a married mother who has her own conservative radio talk show. Myra, the evil twin, is a sexually flamboyant high school girl, ending up a lesbian working at Planned Parenthood.

University of Massachusetts department of Theater presents The Mineola Twins.

One interesting aspect to the play is the requirement for the lead actors to play more than one role: One actress plays Myrna and Myra, Jim (Myrna's fiancé) and Sarah (Myra's lover) are played by a male actor who plays Myra's and Myrna's sons.

Although the script is in the form of a play, this production of the Mineola Twins will play out as musical, with moving sets and overly exaggerated costumes. Music in the play will feature prominent songs of the decades, such as "White Rabbit" from Jefferson Airplane and "She-Bop" by Cyndi Lauper.

The play was written by Paula Vogel, a Pulitzer Prize-winning feminist playwright, who has reached notoriety by writing plays on controversial subjects. Subjects included in her writing repertoire are AIDS (The Baltimore Waltz, which won the Obie Award for Best Play in 1992), domestic violence (Hot and Throbbing) and prostitution (The Oldest Profession). Her latest, How I Learned to Drive, about the pedophilic relationship between an uncle and his niece, won the Pulitzer for Drama in 1998.

The play is at the Fine Arts Center in the Rand Theater on Dec. 6, 7 and 11-14 at 8 p.m. There is also a student matinee on Dec. 11 at 10 a.m. Tickets are $10 for general admission, $5 for students/seniors.

It's a little early to put the season on one game, but last night the Massachusetts women's basketball team made the case that this season could be special.

The Minutewomen defeated Vermont 53-48, highlighted by 35 second-half points.

After trailing by four at halftime, UMass came back late against the talented Catamounts and took the game in the final minutes.

Junior Ebony Pegues led UMass with 15 points and was one of three Minutewomen to reach double-digits. Seniors Jen Butler and Nekole Smith each dropped 11 points en route to the victory.

For Vermont, junior standout Aaron Yantzi led with a game high 18 points – her 23rd straight double-digit performance. Sophomore Lani Boardman went three-for-five from the arc, giving her nine points on the night.

After being down 22-16 at the half, the Maroon and White came out rejuvenated, and used a 9-3 run in the last four minutes to snatch the victory from UVM.

UMass trailed for much of the game and, while it evened up the score three times in the second half, it didn't lead until the 1:59 mark, when a Pegues layup capped an astonishing comeback by the Minutewomen. They knotted the game on a great inside move from Butler at 1:42.

On Vermont's trip back down the court, Pegues stole the ball, broke down court, and laid in the winning basket. The 5-foot-6 Columbus, Ohio, native sealed the deal with one more point from the line with 26 seconds left.

The Catamounts threatened in the final seconds, but Butler came up with a steal down low, and, appropriately enough, was holding the ball as time expired.

"In the last couple of minutes, we got a little hosed," Butler said. "We made a couple rebounds, hit some shots, and then we got excited and our defense stepped up."

Butler's double-double leads way

Massachusetts center Jen Butler has mastered the art of the double-double. She makes double-digit scoring and rebounding look easy.

After an 11-point, 11-board effort against Vermont last night, the leading scorer and rebounder of this year's Minutewoman squad picked up 43th double-double of her career.

But in UMass' 53-48 victory over the Catamounts – in which she was double and triple teamed all game long and with our even a field goal in the first half – Butler showed that any good master of an art will find a way to get the job done.

"I am used to getting double and triple teamed by now...so it took some time for me to settle down and help out my team any way I could," Butler said.

Similar to the defense opposing teams placed on UMass all last season, UVM Head Coach Keith Cieplicki continuously had his squad deny the Minutewomen guards a clear view at Butler in the post in the first half.

Even if Katie Nelson, Ebony Pegues or Cleo Foster were able to make an easy entry pass to Butler, an immediate double or triple team surrounded the 6-foot-3 woman in the middle – forcing Butler to take an awkward shot. She was only able to get off three shots before the break and none of them fell through the cylinder.

Butler tried to kick the ball out to the open UMass shooters on the wing. But her teammates were unable to capitalize on the Catamount defensive switches as the Minutewomen shot 25 percent in the first frame.

"I liked our defense tonight," Cieplicki said. "We tried to mix up our doubles pretty consistently."

Myra, the evil twin, is a sexually flamboyant high school girl, ending up a lesbian working at Planned Parenthood.

Myrna and Myra, Jim (Myrna's fiancé) and Sarah (Myra's lover) are played by a male actor who plays Myra's and Myrna's sons.

Although the script is in the form of a play, this production of the Mineola Twins will play out as musical, with moving sets and overly exaggerated costumes. Music in the play will feature prominent songs of the decades, such as "White Rabbit" from Jefferson Airplane and "Sho-Bop" by Cyndi Lauper.

University of Massachusetts department of Theater presents The Mineola Twins.

The play was written by Paula Vogel, a Pulitzer Prize-winning feminist playwright, who has reached notoriety by writing plays on controversial subjects. Subjects included in her writing repertoire are AIDS (The Baltimore Waltz, which won the Obie Award for Best Play in 1992), domestic violence (Hot and Throbbing) and prostitution (The Oldest Profession). Her latest, How I Learned to Drive, about the pedophilic relationship between an uncle and his niece, won the Pulitzer for Drama in 1998.

The play is at the Fine Arts Center in the Rand Theater on Dec. 6, 7 and 11-14 at 8 p.m. There is also a student matinee on Dec. 11 at 10 a.m. Tickets are $10 for general admission, $5 for students/seniors.

UMass president, William Bulger, is expected to testify today in Boston.

"The notion that two brothers could take such different paths is extraordinarily interesting," Randall Stokes, Chair of Sociology, said. "It's perfectly understandable why he would be subpoenaed given his closeness to Whitey."

M.J. Peterson, professor of political science, said that she thinks William Bulger testifying is a distraction over what the real issue is.

"The main issue is whether the Boston bureau of the FBI got too cozy with the Irish mob," Peterson said. "It's that issue that the Congressional Committee is looking into."

Peterson said that there has been no surprise with the situation that has developed, and that she'd be surprised if anything new develops out of Bulger testifying.

"If he says to the committee what he supposedly said to the grand jury, what more is there to say or do?" she asked.

"Everybody knew that Bill Bulger had brother Whitey and that it could come up in ways that could be embarrassing," she said. "The Board of Trustees may have to decide at some point that the embarrassment is too much. I don't know at what point that will be.

"There's a really tough question here about your duties as a citizen versus your loyalties as a sibling. It raises questions of how morally accountable someone is for their adult sibling," Peterson said.

Chancellor John V. Lombardi could not be reached for comment.

Norwalk virus suspected on Cruises

By Alex Veiga
Associated Press

MIAMI (AP) – Nearly 120 people have been sickened with symptoms consistent with a Norwalk-like virus on a fourth cruise ship to report an outbreak of a stomach ailment in recent weeks.

The Oceana, carrying 1,839 passengers on a 15-night trip, is on only its third sail since its inaugural voyage from Fort Lauderdale's Port Everglades on Nov. 1.

The Norwalk and Norwalk-like viruses can cause diarrhea, stomach pain and vomiting for 24 to 48 hours, according to the CDC. They are spread through food and water and close contact with infected people or things they have touched.

Health officials said the sickness is common, especially in colder months, and that it is unclear whether there have been more cases aboard cruise ships than usual, or if the latest cases have simply received more attention.

The cruise industry, still recovering from a slump attributed to the weak economy and Sept. 11, has been aggressive in trying to reassure the public. The cruise lines have been quick to note that they have been taking ships out of service and scrubbing them from stem to stern.

Travel agents said they have fielded questions from people booked far in advance on cruises, but have not seen many customers back out.

"Our passengers are still cruising," said Jeanne T. Van Houten, owner of Bings Travel in Boca Raton, who said she had only one cancellation. "Some of our passengers who are experienced cruisers do understand the real facts. Some of it has been totally overblown."

The Oceana, operated by P&O Cruises of Great Britain, reported that 114 passengers and three crew members have been treated for some sort of virus; the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention said Wednesday.

More than 1,000 passengers have recently become sick on cruise ships, but cruise lines and travel agents said the problems have not significantly cut into business.

A CDC spokesman said the symptoms aboard the Oceana are consistent with the virus that have recently plagued Holland America's Amsterdam, Carnival Cruise Lines' Fascination and Disney Cruise Line's Magic. Federal health officials were expected to board the Oceana to investigate.

More scandal for church

By Robert O'Neill
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – A priest fathered at least two children in the 1960s and apparently failed to call doctors immediately when their mother collapsed from an overdose, according to personnel files released Thursday that offer another glimpse into the Boston Archdiocese's handling of clergy sexual misconduct.

When details were fully disclosed to church officials nearly three decades later, the Rev. James Foley was ordered into therapy, but was eventually allowed back to ministry under restrictions. It is unclear whether church officials ever notified authorities about the incident.

The documents, obtained by lawyers pursuing sexual abuse claims against the archdiocese, detail how church officials responded in the 1990s to Foley's revelation, the details of which are vague.

Handwritten notes in Foley's file indicate that when the woman collapsed from an apparent drug overdose, Foley got dressed, left, and returned an undetermined time later before calling for help.

The woman also apparently had a lobotomy, although it was not apparent from the notes when or why the procedure was done.

The woman later died, but it is not clear if it was a result of the overdose. Police in Needham, where the documents indicate the woman lived, said they have no record of it. The state Attorney General's office was also examining the documents.

Foley did not return a phone message left at St. Joseph Parish in Salem, where he is associate pastor. Betty Richard, parish secretary, said Foley was no longer serving at the parish and had "been terminated as of (Thursday)."

Archdiocese spokeswoman Donna Morrissey did not return several phone messages seeking comment.

Foley wrote to archdiocese personnel director, the Rev. John McCormack, in 1994 that he received a call "from someone indicating that if I ever made any effort to contact the children of the deceased, then an investigation into the circumstances of the woman's death would be opened. It happened over 25 years ago and it is in the interest of no one to open that tragic story."

Foley's history, which includes at least one other relationship with an adult woman, appears to have deeply troubled Cardinal Bernard Law, who has been criticized for shuffling priests accused of child abuse into new assignments. There are no allegations Foley abused children.

When the details surfaced as part of a routine review, Law and McCormack, now bishop of Manchester, N.H., ordered Foley to resign his post at Our Lady of Fatima Church in Sudbury and to undergo treatment at a residential facility in Canada.

On one occasion, McCormack wrote to a doctor: "Cardinal Law thinks that [Foley] should not be in pastoral ministry due to potential scandal. His remark is that this man should spend his life in a monastery doing penance."

After his release from the treatment facility, the archdiocese in December 1994 agreed to let him live at a rectory and to celebrate Mass while continuing his therapy, but prohibited him from performing other ministerial duties. Foley was placed in a parish in Waltham in January 1995.

Foley hoped to be allowed to do more, and church officials appear to have had mixed feelings about whether Foley should return to a fuller ministry. In 1994, the Rev. Brian Flatley wrote to McCormack, his supervisor in the office of ministerial personnel, that Foley "really has been out of control" and reported McCormack's observation that "he was interacting sexually with the woman at the table and may not have been aware of it."

However, Flatley wrote, Foley "seems to have turned his life around – prayerful, great pastor," and "I would love to see Jim back in ministry."

Law eventually accepted a review board's recommendation that Foley be allowed to return to ministry under certain restrictions, including supervision by a monitor, continued therapy and "that he not enter any situation with women where there is the potential to be compromised."

The last records show that the restrictions were upheld in 1998.

Plaintiffs' lawyers said the archdiocese should have told authorities what it knew about the woman's death. It cannot be determined from the files whether it did so.

"This is not just an issue of someone having consensual sex with women," plaintiffs attorney Eric MacLeish said. "This is a question about what happened that day."

There is no evidence in the file of any improper sexual behavior by Foley after he returned to partial ministerial duty.

Richard, the parish secretary, said Foley was well liked, especially in the Hispanic community to which he ministered. She said she did not know about his past and was not aware of any episodes with women parishioners.

Bulger to testify:

Will the truth come out?

The question of the week has finally been answered: William Bulger will testify today at a hearing for the House Government Reform Committee about any possible knowledge he may have of his brother, refuted mobster James "Whitey" Bulger.

Bulger, as we all certainly know now, has been on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted List for a number of years, having been on the run from racketeering and murder-related charges since 1985. William Bulger, our University's president, has long been rumored to know more about his brother's dealings and current whereabouts than he has ever spoken publicly.

Today we may finally see if William Bulger actually knows anything about Whitey. Bulger first indicated that he would not voluntarily appear for the hearing. Upon being subpoenaed Monday, yesterday afternoon Bulger declared that he will be in Boston today to testify. He faces criminal charges of contempt if he fails to appear.

Bulger, through his attorney Thomas Kiley, has made his wishes known that he would like the proceedings to be kept private behind closed doors. With all the activity and news generated this week around the "will he or won't he" question, the proceedings will undoubtedly not be kept secret.

Chairman Dan Burton has proclaimed that the facts brought forth through these hearings should be public domain.

"I think this is an issue that needs to be illuminated for the people of Massachusetts. We've decided that this issue ought to be discussed before a public hearing," stated Burton.

The major news stations in Boston have already shown their intentions to cut into regularly scheduled programming so that they can air the Bulger testimony live for all to see. One would not be shocked if CNN or MSNBC decided to patch into an affiliate's feed to let the rest of the nation and world see what is going to transpire in Beantown today.

Everyone's mind now shifts as to whether or not the investigative committee will learn any useful information from the UMass president. William Bulger is a politician and will certainly know his way around answering anything he seeks to keep privileged.

Bulger also has the right to take the Fifth Amendment, refusing to testify on the grounds that it might incriminate himself. Burton though, hopes that Bulger will be more forthcoming.

"If he comes, we want him to testify," replied Burton.

The committee will be attempting to ascertain whether or not Bulger not only knows the location of his brother, but also whether or not he used his influence as Senate President and one of the most powerful politicians in Massachusetts, to help protect his brother, an informant for the FBI, from incurring any possible charges.

Bulger is not the first person to testify in this case nor will he be the last. However being the brother of the suspect who is creating all the fuss, along with being famous, will make his answers easily the most talked about and debated.

The fuss of the first week of December is finally over. Bulger will testify. Now let the discussion over his answers begin.

The truth behind anti-drug commercials

EDUARDO BUSTAMANTE

[illegible] drugs a warfare [illegible] port terrorism. A recent advertisement here taught us 12 of the world's 28 known terror organizations are involved in the drug trade. At [illegible] with drug cartels. That means that any terrorist group can make a few hundred million dollars a year selling small [illegible] substances to the United States.

In the year 2000 alone, Afghanistan brought roughly $30.5 billion worth marijuana. In 2000 Afghanistan was responsible for more than 70 [illegible] percent of the world [illegible] Pakistan [illegible] another 400 metric tons [illegible] year. They are well aware that military power with terrorism, and take advantage of its link with organized substances to [illegible] people.

So why are the people who fund such atrocities [illegible] among us? Well, some of them are [illegible] during parents and others made a living selling [illegible] stuff. I was introduced to the fact by Bill Maher when he was the host of the [illegible] Politically Incorrect. He made me [illegible] point, [illegible] for the tobacco [illegible] industries. They don't want us to stop [illegible] America. They don't want us on America's [illegible] their control.

When I first [illegible] about these anti-drug commercials that we know [illegible] armed, funded and trained the Taliban, Al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein. And this all not [illegible] or maybe they are I don't know.

It was the CIA and when I say "armed, funded, and trained," I mean it literally. The CIA put guns in the hands of terrorists and taught them how to shoot. This is not to be mistaken for the fact that the United States prohibited drugs which made it possible for these groups to get very rich and fund their terrorist activities although they did that as well.

What's equally [illegible] is that unwittingly the Partnership for a Drug Free America is making the most convincing argument against drug prohibition I've ever heard with their commercials. Drug use benefiting terrorism has nothing to do with drugs or drug users. What terrorists really benefit from is prohibition.

Whatever we prohibit terrorists will profit from. If tomorrow we decided to prohibit Nutri-Grain bars, it wouldn't take long for nefarious groups to make huge profits selling Nutri-Grain bars at inflated prices to those people that still wanted their delicious oats and grains. At which point Balance Bar, the competition of Nutri-Grain, would put out ads saying "Nutri-Grain eaters may think they aren't harming anyone, but every time they sink their teeth into a chewy Nutri Grain morsel, they hand money to terrorists so they can kill children."

This is the same logic that defeated the prohibition of alcohol. The government saw that the unnecessary power and independence given to mobsters like Al Capone along with the decrease in government credibility, the increase in corruption, law enforcement spending, incarceration, and crime rates caused by prohibition was not worth the ability to say that the United States sent a strong message that alcohol was not OK.

Anti-drug commercials have opened my eyes to new possibilities. That the worst thing we can do is to adopt a prohibitive stance towards a natural demand. That the legalization of mind-altering substances would strengthen our nation and cripple terror groups. That prohibition and peace are mutually exclusive propositions.

I'm sure that this isn't what the anti-drug advertisers had in mind, but I have only them to thank for my new anti-prohibition stance.

What would Jesus wear?

MUNAYYER

While the Constitution and the Bill of Rights became the law of the land, with the First Amendment providing that Congress shall make no law infringing on the freedom of speech of the people. This was the beginning of a saga that continues until today.

I am glad I have the right to speak my mind. I am glad I have the right to criticize government. Not every country in the world gives its citizens these rights. In fact I could not imagine writing many of the things I have written in another country.

However, there is another aspect to freedom of speech. Yes, even freedom has its ugly side. Hate Speech. Many years ago, speech began to be interpreted differently by judicial bodies. It no longer was restricted to what people said or wrote in public. It began to include flag burning. It became legal to burn an American flag because the burning the American flag became a symbol of American freedom. The saga continues.

I'm writing about this now because earlier this week I heard about something that I found quite disturbing. I was told about an individual who was wearing a T-shirt that had some provocative anti-Christian speech on it. The shirt said "Jesus is a [expletive]." I will not sink to the standards of that individual by mentioning that seat of speech to you. I'd rather you use your imaginations.

Tell me, figure out and say it. I am a Christian. I find this offensive and I think that there should be limitations as to what you can wear and what you can say.

Just pause for a moment and give this individual a mental round of applause for achieving his goal of gaining attention. Now stop that! Ok maybe this individual wasn't trying to get your attention by wearing this T-shirt. Maybe he was just wearing it on a cold December day with freezing temperatures to complement his nail polish or something like that. Or maybe I'm getting carried away and he was just talking about another Jesus that none of us had ever heard of and it was just one big inside joke.

I didn't get a chance to talk to this person and I wish I had. I am really interested in why anyone would want to wear something like this. Today if you wore a T-shirt that said the infamous "N" word pertaining to African Americans it would be shunned as hate speech. There is something wrong with using that kind of language. It's things like this that impede the progress of our "civilized" society.

That's another interesting aspect of the debate. The "N" word and anti-Jewish speech which is generalized as anti-Semitism has been found to be a problem. We draw the line when it comes to these issues. But for some reason we are able to accept slurs against Christianity. Now honestly, do you think one could wear a T-shirt depicting a swastika floating above a burning menorah?

"Now honestly, do you think one could wear a T-shirt depicting a swastika floating above a burning menorah?"

The sheer thought disgusts me, however when it is applied to the essence of Christianity we find room for acceptance because in some strange, perverse way it's freedom of speech. At the same time, slurs against people of the Caucasian race are not looked down upon the same way as slurs against minorities. Why is that?

Why will society accept the desecration of the majority? Does free speech in some way entail the right to speak out against a majority? Yes I think it does. However, the laws need to be applied equally. Under our religions, races, nationalities and hateful T-shirts, we are all human. We all feel pain. So there is no excuse for any hate speech of any kind. And the First Amendment should not be used to defend speech like this.

Our society has to make some decisions as to what it will accept and what it won't. Two hundred years ago, you could use the "N" word in an advertisement in a newspaper to sell people. Hate speech. That's what it is. Some people try to tell me that the individual wearing that shirt was not expressing hate speech.

Yeah right, am I to believe what he was really expressing was how much he loved Christianity? Could have fooled me. I'm not saying anyone has to like a particular religion or even any religion at all. I think that it would have been different had it been directed toward another religion and that's not right.

It seems that there are a few justices out there that agree with me. In Turner v. Barr, 806 F. Supp. 1025, 1029 (D.D.C. 1992), a court ordered that employees "refrain from any racial, religious, ethnic or other remarks or slurs contrary to their fellow employees' religious beliefs," and in Snell v. Suffolk County, 611 F. Supp. 521, 531-32 (E.D.N.Y. 1985), another injunction prohibited, among other things, "derogatory bulletins, cartoons, and other written material" and "any racial, ethnic, or religious slurs whether in the form of jokes, 'jests' or otherwise."

This is definitely an important social issue and one that doesn't show signs of going away. And to individuals who wear T-shirts like the one I described, I have this to say. I don't think you are an [expletive]. I just think you are immature. I also think that with the $20 you probably spent on that ever popular T-shirt that is hateful and offensive, you could have bought a decent sweater that would do a better job of keeping you warm in this weather. Maybe if that was the case we would all be further along the road to societal progress than where we are now.

Letter to the Editor:

To the Editor:

After reading Johnny Donaldson's piece in Tuesday's Collegian, "Acting out against activism," I feel compelled to respond to this incredibly ignorant, and I would argue, un-American muddle of an argument.

Donaldson would probably attack my identity as a middle-class Amherst College student, but he'd be doing so only out of the very self-righteousness and egoism he accuses activists of having.

Donaldson seems to be concerned with people who care enough about an issue to take a stand, often putting their own life and limb in jeopardy, as was evidenced by the extreme police brutality shown in Seattle, Wash., and other places of protest and activism. This willingness to sacrifice one's own safety could hardly be characteristic of people who "care only for themselves."

At the core of the piece is a fundamental misunderstanding and ignorance as to the means of real change. He discerns a difference between protesters and activists that has no basis. Activists are protestors in the most profound sense. What Donaldson fails to recognize (perhaps he missed this lesson of United States History), is that our country was founded by activists who were protesting an oppressive and unjust government. Donaldson is condemning the very action that earned our freedom and created our great nation. I suppose he thinks the Boston Tea Party, one of the most important symbols of our American tradition, was the action of "middle-to-upper class brats who have nothing better to do than cause trouble."

The distinction Donaldson is trying to make between protesting and activism ignores structures of power that do not respond to mere words. Anyone can say how they feel, but direct confrontation with those in control is essential to further actual change in policy and attitudes. Does Donaldson really think that intelligent, passionate people are willing to sit back and allow injustice to go unchecked? He wants to paint activists as violent, reckless, self-serving individuals, when in reality nothing could be further from the truth.

It is ideas like these that further the preponderance of injustice, cruelty, inequality and suffering that plagues our small planet today. As someone who cares greatly about the lives of my fellow human beings, I am deeply offended and outraged by this most ignoble piece of writing.

Ours creats a new sound of their own

Precious exhibits wide range of emotion

OURS

FOR A BAND TO COME OUT WITH A NEW ALBUM ONLY A YEAR AFTER ITS DEBUT, YOU WOULDN'T EXPECT MUCH ROOM FOR GROWTH AND DEVELOPMENT OVER SUCH A SHORT SPAN. THE BAND OURS, HAILING FROM NEW JERSEY, MANAGES NOT ONLY TO MEET THE PROMISE DISPLAYED ON THEIR previous offering, Distorted Lullabies, but also goes beyond those promising expectations.

OURS' SOPHOMORE TOUR MATE WITH THEIR NEW RELEASE Precious. THE JERSEY QUARTET RETURNS MORE FOCUSED AND [illegible] ON THEIR SECOND RELEASE.

With their new release Precious, the Jersey quartet returns more focused, with more emphasis on the band achieving its own distinct sound, rather than creating the perfect song through the use of computers, loops or sequencing. The result is a stripped down sound that recalls influences of Jeff Buckley and early Radiohead during their Pablo Honey and The Bends days. Lead singer Jimmy Gnecco also must have had a great appreciation for early U2 records like War and Boy, as is seen through the utter urgency in his vocals.

This more simplistic approach created songs that stand on their own as separate moments in time that sound like first cuts rather than overproduced songs that try too hard for perfection. Many songs on Distorted Lullabies suffered from too much Pro Tooling. Precious is an album based on emotion and honesty, as well as simplicity. Gnecco uses the simple instrument of his voice along with some crafty guitar work, to convey his haunted emotions. At times Gnecco's voice can be too melancholy for some, but the constant rise and fall of his voice, as displayed in songs like "Realize" and "Disaster in a Halo" make his discontent very compelling.

The band also plays a very convincing cover of the Velvet Underground's "Femme Fatale." Ours makes the song truly their own with a more pronounced use of power chords, as well as Gnecco's forewarning voice. "Sure the way she walks/ hear the way she talks/ she's just a little tease/ everyone knows she's a femme fatale." It seems the girl in this song is someone he has met before, and he warns everyone in their right mind to keep their distance.

While many songs are guitar driven with emphasis on volume, Ours does manage to slip in "Places," a catchy ballad that displays Gnecco's softer side. He knows he still has some rough edges and isn't afraid to be critical towards the record industry. He is also aware how easy it is for an artist to become corrupted by money, as displayed on the album's opening track "Kill the Band." Gnecco sings, "I was caught dreaming of wealth/ and what I was taught was creeping in again/ why do you care? It's only money/ kill the band, kill the band."

Gnecco, who grew up during the heyday of Hair Metal, could be voicing his discontent experienced while trying to create a successful band, a struggle that forced the band to go on hiatus until 1996.

Luckily for Ours, there was the alternative music explosion in the early '90s, led by bands like The Smashing Pumpkins, Nirvana and Radiohead. Ours uses these earlier influences to create their own distinct sonic, guitar driven haze.

While the songs on Order of the Leech are produced more conventionally and are quite a bit longer than the seminal 40-second fury of Napalm Death's earliest work, this album, unlike some of their other output, manages to clearly express the distilled concepts of the members signature sound.

As always, Napalm Death eschews melody and harmony, relying mostly on complex rhythmic movements and a maniacal, noisy assault to attract the listener.

Because of his inhuman growl, vocalist Barnes Greenway makes it nearly impossible to discern any of his words. However, it should be noted (although it seems arbitrary) that the lyrics address social issues which is relatively rare in metal music tradition.

All in all, this album will present uncompromising, intelligent and pure heavy metal to all its listeners.

Jane Monheit's young voice soars in Northampton

By Chris Flouton-Barnes
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Jane Monheit
Iron Horse
Dec. 2

NORTHAMPTON – With a light snow falling on a cold Monday evening in Northampton, Jane Monheit wrapped up a two-night stand at the Iron Horse. The young singer warmed the room with a conservative but pleasant program of familiar songs and accessible after-dinner jazz.

With her four-piece band already in gear, Monheit ascended the stairs in a long black leather skirt, stopping to greet several patrons on her way to the front of the room, timing her arrival at the mic perfectly. She launched right into "It Might As Well Be Spring," a Rodgers and Hammerstein tune from the 1945 film State Fair. Drawing out the chorus into a swooping finish, Monheit seemed off to a strong start.

She followed this with Duke Ellington's "Just Squeeze Me," the leadoff track from her latest album on N-Coded Music. She drew half of her selections from this 2002 release, the first of her records to be recorded with her own touring band instead of the luminous lineup of session musicians employed on her first two albums. A slight miscommunication unhinged the ending to this piece, but Monheit laughed it off easily, maintaining a relaxed and casual stage presence.

The next two pieces brought a little flavor into the set, with the bossa nova beat of "Chega de Saudade" (No More Blues) sliding along with alert rhythms and lightly tripping lyrics. Monheit sounded a little pinched and tight here, but expanded her voice on the slinky "Dindi," comping nicely with the mic at arm's length during alto saxophonist Joel Frahm's solo.

Monheit reached back to her debut album for "More Than You Know." She gave a slightly different reading Monday night, though, with a halting, choppy delivery on the verses. Pianist Michael Kanan contributed a measured, bluesy solo before Monheit plunged to the depths of her range for the last note.

One of the more acclaimed pieces in Monheit's repertoire, "Over the Rainbow," was featured mid-set instead of in its more historic spot as her finale. Monheit gives a truly breathtaking rendition of this song, coloring it with unlikely hues and utilizing the full expression of her rich voice. A spurt of microphone feedback sent Monheit giggling at her sound technician, which lacked poise and came across as unprofessional.

There were more giggles to come during an otherwise invigorating take on another R&H tune, Oklahoma's "People Will Say We're In Love." This was a totally swinging, up-tempo take on the song, and Frahm impressed with a sprightly sax solo.

Here, the set took a turn toward the realm of smooth jazz/light pop, with the forgettable and somewhat cheesy "Once I Walked In The Sun," and a pretty version of "Love Has No Pride," a nod to Monheit's infancy when her father would play Bonnie Raitt tapes in the car.

After this brief moment of lighter fare, Monheit thankfully rebounded with the strongest tandem of the night. Pianist Kanan's intriguing arrangement led to a lively version of Irving Berlin's "Cheek To Cheek," with piano and sax echoing the sound of big band charts and drummer (and Monheit's husband) Rick Montalbano adroitly changing tempos with great flair. The complex structure of "Waters of March" highlighted Monheit's vocal dexterity, and featured great interplay and counterpoint between Monheit and Frahm.

The set closed with "Some Other Time." The high point of the number was Joe Martin's elegant and eloquent bass solo. Monheit revved it up for the last crescendo, her voice rising with the cymbals toward an emphatic finish.

The band didn't stray far, returning almost immediately for their encore, a seasonal and snappy "Santa Claus Is Coming to Town." Frahm's tone here was not very full, but Monheit harnessed the spirit and energy of the crowd and finished with a flourish of her glittering diamond bracelet and a toss of her long dark hair.

Monheit shared some thoughts with me afterwards, expressing enthusiasm for the freedom and choice she had during the recording of "In the Sun." She felt that this current tour had been on a much bigger scale than ever before, and revealed that the band would be rocking out to Tenacious D on their van ride back to New York.

Jane Monheit has obviously got the prodigious talent and skill necessary to succeed as a great jazz vocalist. This show displayed her promise as a musician but also some immaturity. However, at only 24, Monheit has plenty of time to put all the pieces together.

Order of the Leech
Spitfire Records

Napalm Death's newest album, Order of the Leech, is a mature, caustic statement from a band that has churned out fantastically heavy music for over 15 years.

Band members invented the heaviest music imaginable (which they dubbed grindcore) at the beginning of their career, and judging from their relatively unvaried output, one might think they ran out of any good ideas a long time ago. However, this would be a mistaken opinion, for Napalm Death should be admired for their consistency and adherence to their original concepts. In fact, the result of the band trying to broaden its sound has produced a less focused, diffuse version of their music.

Madman has reality and heart

THE PROFESSOR & THE MADMAN
Simon Winchester
Harper Collins

You wouldn't think that a novella about the creation of the English Oxford Dictionary would be an exciting and interestingly tense page-turner, would you? Indeed, it is not at all one of those stuffy, infinitely long biographies that book clubs go gaga for. In fact, it's less than 200 pages and is a fascinating and poignant read.

The title of the book refers to two separate people, while at the same time commenting on how every person has both genius and madness within themselves. The Prologue to the book, all of two pages long in double-spaced, large-type font, is one of the most suspenseful and wonderfully written introductions I have ever read, especially considering the fact that the author, Simon Winchester, is dealing with fact.

One of the foremost editors of the massive dictionary was James Murray, who upon near completion of the immense volume wished to celebrate with all of its contributors. William Chester Minor was an American who lived in London, giving what would be the largest portion of information to the dictionary. However, Minor stayed out of the picture, never meeting Murray for reasons of his own. Upon insistent urging, Minor agreed to make Murray's acquaintance if the latter came to visit him. When arriving at what is assumed to be Minor's address, Murray learned that the man who has offered years of his life contributing to the now historic book of our language, is actually one of the longest-residing inmates at an insane asylum.

Winchester does it much better justice than a critic can, but it is clear to see how easy it is to get hooked. What's also enjoyable is imagining the author's clipped and polite British voice echo through the writing. He backtracks several years and explores the upbringing of both men, never abandoning the goal of keeping in mind how both of their lives will eventually intersect as we have learned from the Prologue.

Additionally, Winchester delves further into Minor's madness, and instead of seeing him as some grisly criminal (which is the reader's gut reaction when it's learned why he is in the asylum in the first place), the mental illness is explored and better understood, part of what made the leading characters in movies like One Hour Photo and A Beautiful Mind so endearing even with their distorted view of the world.

This is truly a remarkable book, and even the cover boasting The National Book Award does not seem to do it justice enough. When so many authors nowadays weigh down their books with excessive detail, and write some of the most farfetched plots, Winchester gives the reader a straightforward, fast paced story that is doubly exciting because it actually happened. More authors, aspiring and otherwise should take a hint from this little book (which is actually quite large in its power), and find some of life's most intriguing scenarios to write about instead of possessed Buicks and serial killers who prey on the blind (to cite just two popular sellers out now).

With a lot of mystery, heart, and reality, The Professor and the Madman is one of the most pleasantly surprising reads of the year.

Six degrees of Kevin Bacon

Moderated by Jake D. Lewis
Staff Writer

There is a joke within Hollywood and among movie lovers everywhere that actor Kevin Bacon is connected to every other movie actor/actress by only six degrees. From this a brain teasing game emerged. Becoming known as Six Degrees of Kevin Bacon.

The way to play is simple. Each player names one celebrity and attempts to connect Kevin Bacon and him/her. The goal is to connect Bacon to the other actor/actress through as few movies as possible. Variations of this game is an ongoing activity at the Collegian and will be presented every month. Individuals are asked to e-mail their puzzle solutions to collegianbacon@hotmail.com over the weekend. Winners are chosen from there with different triumphs resulting in a different gain in point value. Points are then tallied and tracked from week to week until the winner of Round One is announced in February. (See point chart below.) Puzzle solutions and winner names/points will appear in Monday's paper.

The puzzle. Only acting roles accepted in the solution.

RealNetworks and Starz-Encore to offer movies over the Internet

SEATTLE (AP) – RealNetworks and the cable movie channel Starz Encore Group are teaming up to offer movie subscriptions over the Internet.

The new service, to be launched in spring 2003, will give subscribers with high-speed Internet connections access to more than 100 movies a month at the same time they're available on Starz cable channels.

Users can download and watch the movies at any time without limited period, typically as long as they're showing on Starz cable channels. The films are aimed at computer viewing, though they won't watch on a television would need additional equipment.

The company haven't announced a price for the new service, called Starz on Demand for RealOne, but executives said Wednesday it will cost about $10 a month, similar to other cable customers pay for Starz premium channels.

Other companies, including MovieLink and CinemaNow, are backed by RealNetworks rival Microsoft Corp., also provide movies over the Internet for a fee.

RealNetworks, Inc. has the reach and reputation to drive the online entertainment industry forward, said John Hatcher, associate analyst with Carmel, Calif.-based Kagan World Media.

"It's probably one of the most important things that Real has done in terms of getting content that people really want to see and Real is the closest thing to an online cable company that there is."

RealNetworks chief executive Rob Glaser acknowledged in a statement that holders of customers will want to watch movies from the Internet but he predicted mass so-called [illegible] will sign up.

Glavine signs three-year deal

By Ben Walker
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – Tom Glavine, the most sought-after pitcher on the free-agent market, reached agreement with the New York Mets on a three-year contract, his agent said Thursday night.

Glavine, 36, had spent his whole career with the Atlanta Braves, winning two Cy Young Awards and posting five 20-win seasons.

But the Braves' NL East rivals, the Mets and Philadelphia Phillies, showed much more interest in the left-hander than his old team. Atlanta has won 11 straight division titles.

"It was one of the toughest decisions he's ever had to make," said his agent, Gregg Clifton. "There wasn't really one thing that decided it. He just made a decision."

Glavine was believed to have gotten a $35 million contract with a vesting option that could make the deal worth $42.5 million.

"We have reached an understanding with Tom Glavine on the structure of a multiyear contract," Mets spokesman Jay Horwitz said. "The completion of an agreement is subject to Tom passing a physical examination on Monday, Dec. 9."

Braves president Stan Kasten, who was attending an Atlanta Hawks game at Philips Arena, declined comment. He said the team probably would hold a news conference Friday.

Glavine did not return a telephone message left at his home.

Fellow Cy Young winners Roger Clemens and Greg Maddux also are free agents, but have hardly generated interest so far in the offseason.

Glavine visited New York and Philadelphia last month. When the pitcher and his wife, Christine, came to New York, he had lunch at the Four Seasons restaurant with general manager Steve Phillips, Mets owner Fred Wilpon, chief operating officer Jeff Wilpon, new manager Art Howe, and pitchers John Franco and Al Leiter.

Mayor Michael Bloomberg also stopped by to help recruit Glavine, as did New York Rangers goaltender Mike Richter and hockey Hall of Famer Rod Gilbert. Glavine was a hockey star in high school and was drafted by the NHL's Los Angeles Kings.

Glavine was 18-11 with a 2.96 ERA this year. He is 242-143 since making his major league debut with the Braves in 1987.

Glavine had been with the Braves longer than any active player, joining them a year before John Smoltz. Along with Maddux, they had formed a rotation that brought them unparalleled success in division play.

When Atlanta won its only World Series championship in 1995, Glavine pitched the clinching game. He gave up only one hit over eight innings and beat Cleveland 1-0 in Game 6 for the title.

Glavine also happens to be the losingest pitcher in postseason history, going 12-15 overall. He has pitched well in some of those defeats, though he was hit hard by San Francisco last October in going 0-2 with a 15.26 ERA in the first round.

Indoor track opens at Boston University

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's indoor track and field team kicks off its season this afternoon as it travels east to compete in a meet hosted by Boston University.

The event, which marks the christening of BU's brand new, state-of-the-art 1,500-seat Track and Tennis Center, is a five-to-six competition that also includes Maine, Central Connecticut State and Providence College. It marks Head Coach Julie Lafreniere's first chance to assess her youthful squad in a competitive atmosphere, and she hopes the hard work the Minutewomen have put in during the fall will be evident in their performance.

"It's our first meet of the season," Lafreniere said. "The girls have been training and working hard during the off-season, but we want that to translate into improvement. We have somewhat of a young team, but our goal is still to finish as high as we possibly can and give ourselves something to build off of."

The women are coming off an outdoor season in which they finished as the runner-up in the Atlantic 10 Track and Field Championships, and return individual A-10 pole vault champion Brandy Green, who won both the indoor and outdoor competitions in that event last year. However, they would like to improve on a disappointing seventh place showing in last year's A-10 Indoor Championship, and Lafreniere thinks they have the pieces in place.

"We have some skilled girls on the squad who are only going to improve," the coach said. "We're looking to get as much meet experience as we can early in the year so we will be ready come A-10s."

In Green, the Maroon and White return a skilled competitor who has already attained conference glory and the respect of her teammates. Her coach hopes that her past success will rub off on the squad and carry over into her junior season.

"[Brandy] is a hard worker who had a lot of success last season," Lafreniere said. "Her teammates look up to her and we just hope she will be able to maintain the same high level of competition this season."

While the Minutewomen look to gauge their progress in today's meet, it may be hard to build off of any potential success due to the fact that the team will break for exams and the holidays following the competition. The timing of the layoff is difficult.

"It's hard to prepare for a meet like this and then just shut down for a month," Lafreniere said. "I wish we didn't have such a long period of time off, but we will look to make the best of it and hopefully return strong in a month.

"Overall, this event should give us an indication of where we are headed as a team. Some of the girls who improved in cross country will hopefully continue that improvement into this season."

It will be these holdovers, such as senior Julie Megee, junior Katie Knowles and sophomore Alexis Anzelone that Lafreniere will turn to in hopes of carrying the young Minutewoman squad through the early bumps that it is sure to endure. In the end, however, the coach thinks her team will turn out successful.

"I think we have a chance to be good as a group," Lafreniere said. "I know that the girls work hard, so I think the results will come."

The meet this afternoon, which is the first to take place inside BU's new facility and will essentially serve as a dress rehearsal for the equipment in the new building, will begin at 5 pm. The Minutewomen will return to action following the aforementioned winter break on Jan. 18, when they will compete in the New England Challenge Cup in Providence, R.I.

the end of the year."

When UMass arrives in New Haven, Conn. this weekend, they will enter some uncharted waters. While many of the older members of the team have experience in three-day events, this will be the first time that the Maroon and White have participated in the Yale Invitational. This not only gives them a chance to perform in an Ivy League facility, but it also provides new competition for the Minutemen. The host school should prove to be the most talented opponent, while UConn and Southern Connecticut also boast strong rosters.

Although the Yale Invitational features stiff competition, it is not a scored event. Since no winner or loser will be declared, the most heated competition that UMass swimmers will face will be their fellow teammates. Of the twenty-one team members, only seventeen will be granted a trip to the A-10 Championships in February. Those swimmers who hope to compete in the A-10 Championships will use this weekend's invitational as a forum to showcase their abilities in a major three-day competition.

"This is the biggest dress rehearsal," Houck said. "Every meet and each practice is like a dress rehearsal, but this weekend is like the big show."

Bledsoe returns with Bills needing win

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) – Drew Bledsoe has a simple goal for his homecoming game against the Patriots: disappoint his longtime fans.

After nine years with New England, he's led the Buffalo Bills' surge to playoff contention. Win Sunday, and they're tied with the Patriots at 7-6 in the tight AFC East race. Lose and they're a long shot.

"I'd hoped all along that when we got to these games that they'd be important games from the standpoint of the playoff race," Bledsoe said. "That's really turned out to be the case."

The drama of his first game against his former team is gone. The Bills are last 3-7 at home Nov. 3, starting a three-game slide that ended with a 38-21 win over Miami last Sunday.

But the fans still know who's visiting – the man they rooted for until he lost his job early last season to Tom Brady. The scene is spacious Gillette Stadium, not spartan Foxboro Stadium where Bledsoe spent his time with New England.

"It's a little disappointing that the thing didn't get done before I left," he said, "but at least I get a chance to come and see it now."

And, probably, hear the same chants he couldn't always make out when he was a Patriot. Are the fans yelling "Drew" or "Boo?"

"I think they'll welcome him with open arms. They should. He helped build this house that they're sitting in," Patriots strong safety Lawyer Milloy said. "He's a buddy of mine, but once the whistle blows, it's the Buffalo Bills vs. the New England Patriots."

The last time that happened, the Patriots had one of their best ground games of the year. And last Sunday, the Bills allowed 270 yards rushing to Miami, including 228 to Ricky Williams, who scored on runs of 45 and 55 yards.

But the Dolphins managed only 30 yards passing and lost as the Bills had five touchdowns, including Bledsoe's 73-yard pass to Peerless Price, after totalling three in their previous three games.

Buffalo's young defense is "a work in progress," coach Gregg Williams said. "Each week we get a little bit better and a little bit older."

Brads threw four of his NFL-high 24 touchdown passes in his first game against Bledsoe, who threw one touchdown and took four sacks against coach Bill Belichick's confusing defense.

"The good thing about it is, this time in the season there's only so much you can do" in game-planning, Bills guard Ruben Brown said. "He's played every hand he could possibly play."

Oh, yeah?

"We've got something unique for (Bledsoe)," Patriots linebacker Roman Phifer said.

The Patriots are 4-1 in their last five, but three of those wins came against Chicago, Minnesota and Detroit, all 3-9. Buffalo is better, but the Patriots didn't allow a touchdown in their 20-12 Thanksgiving Day win over the Lions.

"The Detroit game really symbolized what this team is all about," center Damien Woody said. "Play good defense, grind it out on offense, good special teams play."

A win would keep another late-season rally going for the Patriots, who won their last nine games last season, including the Super Bowl. A win for the Bills would keep them vying for their first playoff berth in three years, and they might have the psychological edge of trying to win in Bledsoe's old home.

"If psychology won games, we would all be taking psychology classes," Patriots defensive end Willie McGinest said.

Werner ices national award

First at UMass to earn offensive honor

By Matt Brady
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Many people around Massachusetts hockey thought Stephen Werner was overlooked by the Hockey East Association when it handed out its weekly awards. Just ask the guy who was awarded the conference's top honor of the week.

"Steve's a modest kid, that's the way he is," said sophomore Greg Mauldin, who received Player of the Week honors from the conference. "He deserved Hockey East Player of the Week, and definitely Rookie of the Week. I don't know who did the voting, but he got gypped out of those."

Werner got his recognition, though, being rewarded for an eight-point, plus-11 week by receiving U.S. College Hockey Online's (USCHO) National Player of the Week Award for the period ending Dec. 1. The freshman was one of the driving forces behind a trio of wins against East Coast Athletic Conference foes.

"[Receiving the award] feels good," Werner said. "I worked a whole lot to get to college and I hoped to do well. I just hope it continues."

But just like the majority of UMass Head Coach Don Cahoon's team, the individual recognition can't last for long.

"We have a big test against BU this weekend," he continued. "We all know the real recognition we want is to make the top 15 and be in the top four or five teams in Hockey East. I just hope individual awards are a stepping stone to doing it."

The Chevy Chase, Md., native became the third Minuteman ever to be honored by USCHO, joining former netminder Mike Johnson, who won Defensive Player of the Week in 2001 with a 60-save effort against Boston College, and Markus Helanen, who won the same award after UMass took three points from Maine Nov. 13-14, 1998.

The freshman tied a career high by scoring four points in a 7-2 drubbing of Dartmouth on Saturday. He scored a tip-in goal late in the first period and added three assists as he and linemates Greg Mauldin and Matt Anderson totaled 11 points in the contest.

"Everyone's contributing this year," said Mauldin, who scored his first career hat trick in that game. "When Steve plays right wing and gets numbers and Matt [Anderson] is getting numbers it makes it easier for me. People can't concentrate on one line on this team. I think it's a real group effort more than anything. The defense is scoring a lot too."

"It's always nice to have a line on the same page as you," Werner said. "We play a similar game, we're interchangeable for the most part. That's one of the reasons we're able to produce and play well."

Werner followed that up with two points in a 5-3 victory over Princeton to close out the week. He tipped in another goal past PC goalie Nate Nomeland and added an assist on Mauldin's empty-netter in the third.

The program's first product of the U.S. National Team Development Program opened the trio of games with a goal and an assist in a 6-2 win over Vermont in Burlington. Werner made an ice-long pass to Jeff Lang, springing the sophomore on a breakaway that gave UMass a 5-1 lead. He added a goal later in the contest.

Werner now leads Hockey East in plus/minus with a plus-15 for the season. He is also second in the conference and fourth in the nation among rookie scorers.

But again, the individual accomplishments take a back seat to the fact that the Minutemen are the hot topic around Hockey East and the nation.

"People are starting to realize we have a good team here," Werner said. "We're starting to get things going and people around campus are noticing us."

Swimming prepares for all-day events at Yale

By Reid Davenport
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's swimming team, after a more than St. John's last week-based, mini-invitational tentative focus, meet and Yale, New Haven, Conn. for the two-day meet also known as the Sprints, this year, will divide at three days here, three full sessions of morning and night events for a total of opportunities to [illegible] Yale's Northrop Campus what his swimming and diving made of.

"This is a great opportunity for us," Newcomb said. "This meet will give everyone a chance to swim at a championship level for the year. Although it's also a [illegible] this year, we'll be looking for a lot more out of our kids and possibly those people around Yale. So, this is a great opportunity to get a feel for the level of the competition."

Starting on Friday and lasting [illegible] ended [illegible] Newcomb estimated [illegible] the meet [illegible] of the season. The meet will [illegible] the team [illegible] the Big Green history break and [illegible] swimmers [illegible] the Atlantic 10 Championships at the end of the year.

"This is a great meet to end the semester with," Newcomb said. "It will be long and tiring as the girls have to get up six different times to compete, but there will be plenty of time to rest after it's all over. The main goal of this meet is to create a successful atmosphere for the team so they're ready for the Atlantic 10s at the end of the season."

Host Yale will be a force to be reckoned with. Last year, the Bulldogs had their best season with a few of their swimmers breaking a total of seven school records, including 1000 meter freestyle, 200m butterfly, 200 and 400 individual medleys and the one diving event. Not only that, but they also have four experienced record breakers and a few Ivy League champions returning again this season to increase their strength. While Yale is in a different league than the Minutewomen, they will provide an excellent challenge for the Massachusetts women's team.

The Yale Invitational goes from Dec. 6 through Dec. 8. The Minutewomen will be diving back into the pool on Jan. 4 in San Juan, Puerto Rico for the Sacred Heart Invitational. The Atlantic 10 Championships will be running later in the season from Feb. 20 to Feb. 22 in Buffalo, NY.

Meet seen as preview of A-10 Championship

By Jeff Boyd
COLLEGIAN STAFF

To most non-competitive, traditional dual meet is probably enough for a regular swimmers. Beginning this afternoon, the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team will be subjected to three days of competition as it participates in this weekend's Yale Invitational.

Head Coach Russ Yarworth not only expects his team to [illegible] to formal this weekend, but he also expects to see some peak performances for the first time this season.

"I told the guys whether you feel good or feel bad, this is the time to swim hard and fight," Yarworth said. "They know that this was the thing that we've been pointing to since September – to swim fast this weekend."

Yarworth also plans on using this weekend's meet as a "dress rehearsal" for the Atlantic 10 Championships held at the end of the season. By entering swimmers in up to three events each day, Yarworth hopes to get a clear idea of which team members will go on to compete in the conference championship.

"I'm going to be stepping back to evaluate how they do and how they survive a three-day meet," Yarworth said. "If a kid swims well on day one, and is junk on day three, then I have to take that into consideration."

Most athletes would dread the thought of having to compete for three-straight days. Tri-captain Justin Houck, on the other hand, welcomes the challenge.

"I love the three-day events," Houck said. "It's easy to go out and swim fast for one day, but it's a lot harder to swim fast for three days. It's tough to stay mentally motivated for three days."

A meet with this type of format will be new to many of the younger swimmers.

Yarworth, along with the veteran team members have been working to prepare the entire squad for this event which should be a strong indicator of what to expect at the A-10 Championships.

"This meet has so much to do with the end of the year," Houck said. "If you can swim fast at this type of competition, then you can pretty much guarantee that you're going to swim fast at

Minutewomen head north

GERALDINE ONGKOWIJOJO/COLLEGIAN

SOPHOMORE POINT GUARD KATIE NELSON IS AVERAGING JUST UNDER 10 POINTS AND FIVE ASSISTS PER GAME FOR THE MINUTEWOMEN.

By Andrew Merritt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Wednesday night, the Massachusetts women's basketball team stole a victory from the Vermont Catamounts, never leading until the final 1:27. Tomorrow, it takes on another America East team, but one that isn't as strong as UVM, and the matchup could be a sign of what kind of team UMass is.

The New Hampshire Wildcats are 2-2 on the season, with wins over Manhattan and Dartmouth, and losses to Marist and Georgetown. The Minutewomen are now 4-1, their best start in nine years.

The Maroon and White will also be reminded of last year's meeting with the Wildcats. New Hampshire took the game 66-44 on 41 second half points. Senior Jen Butler had a double-double by the end of the first half for UMass, and finished with 15 points and 15 rebounds, but Heidi Plencner (17 points in 25 minutes) led the Wildcats to the victory.

The loss was the fourth in a six-game slide for the Minutewomen.

A year can make all the difference, though, and so far the Marnie Dacko era at UMass has been successful. The Minutewomen showed some resiliency in comeback wins against Saint Peter's and Vermont, and proved they could run with a big time team when they defeated Toledo on Dec. 1.

The Maroon and White will look to build on the end of Wednesday night's game, in which Butler, senior Nekole Smith, and junior Ebony Pegues came up big in the clutch to give UMass the edge.

New Hampshire is led by sophomore center Maren Matthias. The 6-foot-3 Guilford, Conn. native is averaging 15.5 points and 9.8 rebounds per game, and scored sixteen points with eight boards in the Wildcats' 90-60 loss against Georgetown Wednesday.

Freshman Geneva Livingston is third on the team with 10.5 points per game, and is 8-for-16 from the three-point line.

The Minutewomen will be entering hostile territory when they walk onto the court at Lundholm Gymnasium, where the Wildcats are 2-0 in the regular season.

While this will be Dacko's first career game against New Hampshire, she sees a likeness between the Wildcats and Vermont.

"[They are] very similar to Vermont in what they want to play, and what they want to do," she said. "And the focus will be staying on the road. I think when you go in and play a team that you've lost to a year before, it just gives you an incentive to go up and want revenge, and I think we'll be ready."

Bulger pleads the Fifth

President chooses not to testify

By Scott Eldridge II
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BOSTON – In a matter of minutes it was over.

University of Massachusetts President William Bulger appeared before the United States House of Representatives Committee on Government Reform Friday after being subpoenaed earlier in the week.

"This committee has been trying to get to the bottom of what has been happening here," said committee chair Dan Burton (R-Indiana). "We want to hear from you."

The UMass president declined, and invoked the Fifth Amendment.

Bulger was before the Committee to answer questions about interactions with his brother, James "Whitey" Bulger. Whitey, who is currently on the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Top 10 Most Wanted List and has a one million dollar price tag on his head, has been a fugitive since 1995.

He was also expected to field questions about former FBI agent John Connolly, Jr. Connolly was convicted earlier this year for the misuse of informants and looking the other way as they committed a variety of crimes, including murder, and tipping them off so that they could avoid arrest. James Bulger was one of Connolly's informants.

Thomas R. Kiley, Bulger's attorney, failed in his formal attempt to close the hearing. In a letter presented to the Committee on Thursday, he asked members to hear the Bulger testimony in executive session, closed to the press and public.

"We feel that the issue is such that the hearing should be held in open session," Burton said.

The panel unanimously denied the appeal for a closed session as well as a request to postpone the hearing.

Bulger's appearance was brief. Choosing not to answer any of the committee's questions, he said that answering queries may "tend to incriminate myself."

He cited the Supreme Court case Ohio v. Rainier and the court's decision that protects citizens from being prosecuted based on vague charges and questions.

"The law protects men ensnared by ambiguous circumstances. I find myself in such circumstances," Bulger said.

The former Massachusetts Senate president turned academic authority maintained his composure and left the courtroom with a smile across his face.

As quickly as he had come in, Bulger was gone.

"This [hearing] is about government abuse," said Kiley after the hearing was adjourned. "It is my job to protect my client from government abuse."

Kiley said that Bulger did not answer questions "virtually on the insistence of counsel." He said that his concern for the UMass president is that any misstatements could be held against him.

He said that after seven years of James "Whitey" Bulger being a fugitive, William Bulger might not be able to accurately recall facts, and that this could lead to misstatements.

"The reality for this old man is that memory fails," Kiley said refer-

Executive Session rejected

BOSTON – The day began with such promise.

University of Massachusetts President William Bulger arrived in court on Friday with a façade of good spirits, squelching the rumors that he would not honor a subpoena to appear before the House Committee on Government Reform.

Committee chair Dan Burton (R-Indiana) opened the proceeding with optimistic speak, saying, "I am glad Mr. Bulger is here, though I wish he would have made it easier."

Suddenly there was a u-turn in progress, as Bulger counsel Thomas R. Kiley's motion for an Executive Session that excluded the public and media was unanimously denied by the committee.

Pessimism befell the courtroom with the rebuff, almost assuring that Bulger would not cooperate with the Committee.

The 68-year-old University President validated the negativity as he said, "The Fifth Amendment's basic function is to protect innocent men who might be ensnared by ambiguous circumstances. I find myself in such circumstances," in response to the initial question about brother and fugitive James "Whitey" Bulger's whereabouts.

Bulger, with the advice of his lawyer, called upon his rights to privacy and due process in refusing to answer any questions.

In 15 minutes, optimism had turned to disappointment, dealing a blow to the objective of the Committee and spawning even more inquiries.

Bulger's testimony looms as a roadblock on the path to cleaning up the Federal Bureau of Investigation. There's no way around it and few ways to break through.

Now the question remains, is Bulger's testimony worth granting his request for a closed session? "We feel that the issue is such that the hearing should be held in open session," Burton said.

Alcohol abuse suggestions approved

TASK FORCE ON THE PREVENTION OF ALCOHOL ABUSE MEMBER JO-ANNE VANIN HOPES THAT THE CREATION OF ALCOHOL FREE DORMITORIES WILL CREATE A POSITIVE LIVING AND LEARNING EXPERIENCE FOR THE INCOMING FIRST YEAR STUDENTS.

By S.J. Port
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate approved the recommendations of the Chancellor's Task Force on the Prevention of Alcohol Abuse on Thursday.

The recommendations included establishing an alcohol-free dorm as well as rescinding the designation of Greek residences as campus-approved housing for freshmen. The decisions will take effect in September.

In addition, the Senate approved an evaluation of the effectiveness of student enforcement of drinking laws in residence halls and existing alcohol policies. They plan to begin evaluations in February 2003.

The Task Force feels that the recommendations they have made will help the University's effort to change the attitude towards alcohol and its abuse on campus. The Faculty Senate had not heard the Committee formally since its creation last year by then Interim Chancellor Marcellete Williams.

Task Force co-chair Robert Sinclair, a professor of education, explained why the group spent most of the past year delving into the issues involving alcohol abuse on campus as well before making any conclusions or recommendations. He said they have yet to meet as a group with Chancellor Lombardi, but plan to do so later in the year to discuss a second set of recommendations to be administered next fall.

He explained that they felt a need to "move inside" the issue before they made surface attempts to fix it.

"We feel it is a community health problem," he said.

Sinclair said that he felt that press coverage of such incidents as the recent Hobart Hoedown, as well as images displayed in news segments on students in local bars, "makes our University more vulnerable to outside offices."

According to Sinclair, the Task Force holds the view that "students cannot stop other students from bringing alcohol into the dorms."

He said that the Task Force planned to investigate how effective resident assistants were with alcohol policies. He and other members of the Force found it difficult to believe that RAs have the leverage over their student peers to persuade against breaking alcohol policies within housing.

Jo-Anne Vanin, dean of students and associate vice chancellor and a Committee co-chair, said that according to her research, the problems that the University has with students abusing alcohol are not different to those at a majority of other campuses. However, she believes that specifically the UMass Amherst campus has, in years past, had a reputation for alcohol abuse.

"There are 11,000 students on campus. We have a populous that changes by one quarter every year, bringing in new young people with their own norms and experience with alcohol," Vanin said. "This and the lack of a coherent first year experience contribute to problems."

Vanin and the Task Force see the creation of an alcohol free dormitory on campus as an opportunity to set up incoming freshman with a "positive living and learning experience." They did not say which dorm has been chosen to be the alcohol-free residence, except to say that it will be one of the campus' smaller dormitories.

"We're looking at a one of the small dormitories, 120 to 140 beds," Vanin said.

Eventually, Vanin and Sinclair said that the Task Force would like to see an alcohol-free residence in each of the campus living areas. Vanin differentiated between having a wellness floor, on which students contain themselves but can easily move up or down a floor to enjoy an alcohol assisted atmosphere, and having an entire building set a side for students who desire substance-free housing.

Senators questioned who would be responsible for the evaluations of student enforcement of alcohol policies and the effectiveness of existing policies following the conclusion of the report.

Sinclair said that the Office of Student Affairs, which Vanin presides over, would be in charge of assessing student's ability to enforce policies among their peers and that the Task Force would be evaluating the current policies' effectiveness.

Senator Brian O'Connor, a professor of biology, thanked the Task Force for their work and said that in his own experience of discussing alcohol with students one could "hear a pin drop" when the topic was broached. He said that on a recent test, one question that every student answered correctly had to do with alcohol's effect on the body.

Iraq dossier arrives in United States

By Dafna Linzer
ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS (AP) – Iraq's massive dossier detailing its chemical, biological and nuclear programs arrived yesterday in New York, where U.N. weapons inspectors plan to comb through the voluminous report to determine whether Baghdad is complying with Security Council resolutions.

Two copies of the 12,000-page dossier arrived at John F. Kennedy International Airport on a Lufthansa flight from Frankfurt, Germany, at 7:45 p.m.

The nuclear component of the declaration arrived earlier Sunday in Vienna, Austria, where the International Atomic Energy Agency is based. The chemical, biological and missile components of the dossier will be analyzed and translated by U.N. inspectors based in New York.

One copy of the declaration is for the Security Council and the other is for the U.N. Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission, known as UNMOVIC, which oversees the search for biological and chemical agents.

Mohamed ElBaradei, the IAEA's director-general, said analysts in Vienna began work immediately on the declaration, "including the painstaking and systematic cross-checking of the information it contains.

Iraq's account will be compared with intelligence provided by other nations and with data from past and present inspections, he said.

The IAEA hopes to provide the Security Council with a preliminary analysis within 10 days and a more detailed analysis when it reports back to the council at the end of January, ElBaradei said.

Hans Blix, the chief U.N. weapons inspector, will meet with the Security Council on Tuesday to update them on how long it will take his team to sift through its sections of the documents, translate the Arabic portions and even remove so-called sensitive material which could get into the wrong hands.

Iraq insists it has no programs for developing nuclear, biological or chemical weapons. It turned over the declaration to U.N. officials in Baghdad on Saturday – a day before the United Nations' deadline.

INDIANA REPRESENTATIVE DAN BURTON (R) SPEAKS TO REPORTERS ABOUT WILLIAM BULGER'S DECISION TO PLEAD THE FIFTH AMENDMENT.

■ Bulger

ring to himself.

Kiley said that he felt some of the 46 members of the Congressional Committee hold a grudge against William Bulger.

"If they can't have one Bulger, we fear they'll have another. If it's not Whites it will be Bill," Kiley said.

He declined to name any Committee members whom he felt were holding a grudge.

"I don't have any old score," said Burton, maintaining the Committee's mission to reform the FBI and other government agencies.

Burton also said that he was disappointed in Bulger's refusal to testify about Connolly.

Marty Meehan (D-Mass.) said that the Committee will explore other options to get Bulger to testify, including the possibility of immunity.

"I think it would be the prudent thing to do," he said. "We need to clean up the FBI."

However, he said that if Bulger is given immunity for testimony, he may still have to testify openly.

Some in the media suggested that Bulger's choice to plead the Fifth means he has something to hide. Kiley defended the decision, saying it came "on the advice of counsel and almost on the insistence of counsel."

"Any statement that he might make could be used against him," Kiley said, adding that he thought his client was being targeted by groups seeking to "settle a score" or exact "revenge."

"I have no scores to settle in Massachusetts," Burton retorted. "I love the city, I love the people. I love the food."

The committee did not rule out the possibility of granting Bulger immunity.

"Questions would have to be answered fully and wouldn't be skirted in anyway," said Marty Meehan D-Massachusetts. "We could give immunity and still have public testimony."

"We're after the truth," Burton said. "It may be the hard truth, the painful truth, the ugly truth. But by god, this Committee is after the truth."

With the Committee's refusal to grant an Executive Session, it's clear the hearings are not only about getting the truth out of Bulger, but also having the public and media there to witness it.

Bulger made it known with one brief statement that at this time, he's not willing to open his statements to public knowledge.

"The only thing necessary for evil to triumph is good to do nothing," Burton said during his opening statement.

His remark was meant for the witness. But with a refusal to budge on the Executive Session request, prolonging Bulger's silence, the question now becomes if the Committee should turn that line on itself.

400 protest after latest Church abuses disclosed

By Bipasha Ray
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) – Cardinal Bernard Law faces a rebellion of Boston-area clergy as well as rekindled calls for his resignation from priests and parishioners alike following new revelations of misconduct in the Archdiocese of Boston.

Some 400 protesters gathered Sunday outside the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, where Law typically celebrates Mass.

Law usually says Mass at the cathedral on Sundays but was in Rome. Instead, archdiocese spokeswoman Donna Morrissey said. She said she did not know why he was there.

The larger-than-usual weekly protest, as well as a new petition from priests seeking Law's ouster, was fueled by the release of new internal church documents containing new allegations suggesting church officials tolerated a wide range of clergy misconduct, and not just sexual abuse of boys.

"His presence here is hindering the ability of the victims to come out. He is the real voice of dissent here. He is the one flouting Catholic teachings time and again," said Jean Garrity, 43, Wellesley, and a member of the dissident group Voice of the Faithful.

Law has brushed off calls for his resignation for months, but he must now defend himself for the first time from an organized effort by priests seeking his ouster.

Boston-area priests have been circulating a draft statement calling for Law's resignation. The petition, which originated at a gathering of priests at a Newton parish, praised Law for his leadership, but said that the release of damaging internal church files makes his resignation "a necessary step."

"The events of recent months and, in particular, of these last few days, make it clear to us that your position as our bishop is so compromised that it is no longer possible for you to exercise the spiritual leadership required for the church of Boston," the petition reads.

The Rev. Robert Bullock, the head of a 250-member Boston Priests Forum, said the draft document, which called for 50 signatures by noon Sunday, would require many more signatories to indicate a "consensus" that Law had to go. Once the document was finished, he would sign it himself, he said.

"We need new leadership, and we cannot build trust and confidence without new leadership," he said.

The Boston Priests Forum plans to discuss calling on Law to resign at a meeting Friday, he said.

Morrissey said she could not comment on the petition because she had not seen it. She also said that Law was not deterred by Sunday's protest at the cathedral, but did not specify where he was instead.

The Rev. Robert Carr, parochial vicar of the Cathedral of the Holy Cross in Boston, said he would not sign the petition Law's critics, he said, don't have the answers.

"Just because he leaves doesn't mean the guy who comes in is going to solve the problem, and that's really the issue," Carr said.

Paul Kendrick, 55, of Portland, Maine, came to Boston on Sunday specifically to demand Law's resignation, but he said he would also support Law being made to answer for his actions in court.

"I think that no one is immunized from civil law," Kendrick said. "Mostly we are here today to ask for Cardinal Law's resignation, but if he has broken laws he definitely should be prosecuted."

The papers, part of a massive release of church personnel files that victims' lawyers pried from the archdiocese, document a priest beating his housekeeper and threatening alleged sex abuse victims, and the trading cocaine for sex and a third enticing teenagers training to become nuns into sex by claiming to be the second coming of Christ.

Later in the week, other papers disclosed that a priest fathered at least two children and apparently failed to immediately get medical help for the mother of their children as she overdosed.

With the new reports making national headlines, the finance panel of the archdiocese gave Law authority on Wednesday to seek a Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing – a move that may prove financially necessary but would infuriate abuse victims seeking damages.

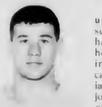
[illegible] before a grand jury last year and has maintained that he has [illegible] with Whitey since shortly after his disappearance in 1995.

[illegible] there's not much anyone can do about William Bulger's refusal [illegible] has no proof that Bulger has done anything wrong.

[illegible] is also no denying that Bulger is constitutionally protected by the Fifth [illegible] a right that all of us enjoy with or without fugitive siblings. He [illegible] say anything, guilty or innocent.

[illegible] sensitive situation has been marred with shady delays and other [illegible] tactics. At least Bulger finally stepped forward and said something to [illegible] congressional committee. Pleading the Fifth certainly wasn't very construc-[illegible] and public, especially to the family of Whitey's victims, but was within his [illegible] the confines of the law.

[illegible] staff opinions, we at The Collegian strongly urged President [illegible] to respond to the congressional committee in some fashion. Though it [illegible] may not be the way all of us on staff wanted to see it addressed, at least he used [illegible] within the law to deal with it, instead of ignoring a congressional sub-[illegible] and breaking the law even more.



[illegible] or with or without his testimony, the congressional committee will continue to [illegible] the truth. You can't choose your relatives. William Bulger didn't choose [illegible] the younger brother of a Boston mobster and has ended up being an involu-[illegible] participant. We as the UMass community are also indirectly along for [illegible].

[illegible] important to keep in mind, that pleading the Fifth carries with it a harsh [illegible] on William Bulger's connection to the University and his brother have already left [illegible] stain on our institution's reputation. As this investigation continues it [illegible] is vital that Bulger remembers that the UMass community is also a part of [illegible]. If Bulger has information that he is withholding from the FBI, he should [illegible] them. Otherwise, his silence and sheer presence here is detrimental to our [illegible].

Credentials need to be worked for:
Or degrees are worthless

CAREY

In my father's time, upon graduating high school, one really only had two choices for beginning a life that included a successful career with ample material gain. The first was to join the Army. However, after Vietnam and the introduction of nationally televised warfare including the My Lai massacre, the armed services came to be seen as a moral hindrance rather than a promising career move.

Thus the second option, college, became more of an attraction for the young aspiring minds of American youth. And so, today it's not unlikely to find 75 percent of the student body going on to some kind of higher learning after high school. All in pursuit of bright futures in this great land we live in.

In order to be a well-functioning member of society, a college degree is an important necessity. From an employer's standpoint, without one a person is inferior and incapable of holding down any job considered at middle class standing. Thus, we are left with masses of undeclared upperclassmen, bewildered psychology majors and the always confused and misguided sport management crowd. All of them aimlessly searching for identity and prestige in an uncertain future that will hopefully not find them in the unemployment lines, or working at an outlet store helping prepubescent brats try on shoes while their parents stand over them scrutinizing their every move.

You can spot these people everywhere around campus. In fact, the majority of the students reading this paper probably don't have the slightest clue what they want to do out of college. This doesn't bother me; college is a learning process, a journey of self-discovery and awareness. What concerns me the most is that many students don't see it like that. For them, college is an extravagant social event sponsored by their parents. These people snake through the college system, finding courses offering them the least amount of mental resistance. The result is a college education that hasn't contributed and in some cases stymied their personal growth. But their hands will be stamped in a manner that will allow them to achieve, at least, middle class stature in the job market.

"So many solutions to life reveal themselves when one endeavors to exercise their mind."

The result of cranking out college degrees leaves behind its trail of disgruntlement. For instance, in almost every university around the country, professors complain of apathetic students too timid or ignorant to venture in on class participation. This has far reaching effects on the individual student. Afraid of being challenged on any mental level, they never explore the world around them and thus do not see their place in it. As a result there are many people in college right now who have absolutely no business being here. Their view of college begins and ends with obtaining a degree. Other than that college is just a future job credential that's treated with a grain of salt.

The flaws with holding this philosophy are numerous, and quite obvious to point out. The largest is that it is a personal waste of time, money and effort on the part of the student. If you think you're one who is ideally going through the motions of a college education all in order to receive a stamp on your hand, may I suggest the only solution to remedy the situation? Get off your lazy butt and think! So many solutions to life reveal themselves when one endeavors to exercise his or her mind. This is the essential idea that college attempts to convey to students. College isn't a place that hands out credentials, it's supposed to challenge and improve the minds of a broad contingent of the population. However, for so many, this is hardly the case.

I'm not sure to what extent our lazy student body is a cultural reflection. But certainly our decadent, TV-obsessed, consumer-based culture, from which we have all spawned must be contributing to the ever-growing pool of those who ignorantly embrace the negative beliefs mentioned above. Ideally, I'd like to think that America's lack of mental discipline is simply that, and not something that takes place worldwide. Having not traveled very far in my short life, I don't know. I only have statistics to look at, and other people's accounts to rely upon. Therefore I'm uncertain whether or not it is fruitless to ask my society to think more and prattle less.

I will recommend that if you are currently in college and fretting over what you will become after it is over then take an active approach towards learning. Get more for your money than a few lousy credits and a degree. Exploring the resources of your own mind can lead to a life with the greatest possible returns.

Our ever-silent president

MATTHEW DESPRES

In the summer of 1995, as the Federal Bureau of Investigation launched its worldwide manhunt for James "Whitey" Bulger, the fugitive was spotted in the thick of the hunt, taking a stroll in the L Street Bathhouse in South Boston.

In a sighting confirmed by the FBI in 1998, Bulger was again spotted on the run, this time at a convenience store in Sioux, Iowa.

In an alleged 2000 sighting, soon after a profile on "America's Most Wanted," Bulger was reportedly seen outside a beauty parlor in Fountain Valley, Calif., waiting for girlfriend Catherine Greig.

And on Friday, in a confirmed appearance at a Boston courthouse, University of Massachusetts President William Bulger stood before a congressional committee, invoked the Fifth Amendment, and walked away. Neither the FBI, nor anyone in attendance for that matter, were able to confirm the consequences that action will ultimately have – on Bulger as a brother, a professional and representative to the Commonwealth of the collective University community.

Quite frankly, neither can I.

Bulger's employment of his constitutional right against self-incrimination was far from surprising. Prior to the hearing, under the guidance of lawyer Thomas R. Kiley, the UMass President had been angling for an out, seeking a way to turn the case inward and away from the public eye. When Bulger's options ran out under a fast-approaching deadline, it was silence, not revelation about mafia brethren, which brought the proceedings to an abrupt halt.

"The Fifth Amendment's basic function is to protect innocent men who might be ensnared by ambiguous circumstances," Bulger said. "I find myself in such circumstances."

Perhaps even more abrupt, however, is the sense of ambiguity in public opinion that has come to define the role President Bulger plays in his brother's case. As a sibling, we the people assume that blood obscures legality, that his pledge to silence is a sure-fire sign of something to hide.

As University President, we wonder about the impact his decision will have on the image of the school – but are the ties between the case and his professional responsibilities directly relevant, if existent at all? The actions, if not whereabouts, of brother "Whitey" were long known and well-documented by the time Bulger ascended to the UMass post in 1996; since then, it's hard to believe those infamous family ties have had any impact on the University's well-being. Is it Whitey that's responsible for budget cuts? Does widespread early retirement stem from him? Can he account for the dramatic slashes to student services and promised faculty contracts?

No.

Does Bulger's refusal, then, to presently comment on a personal (read: not professional) issue directly impede the progress – or lack thereof – he's made with current University efforts and initiatives?

Unlikely. Why, then, all the harsh public criticism that's continued to fall out since well before Friday?

Hell, the stigma attached to the Fifth is simply too enticing to ignore. Add to that Bulger's unique role as a public figure and spokesman and we've got ourselves the makings of a primetime soap opera – minus, with respect to Mr. Bulger, the allure of an attractive face in any one of the lead roles.

Bulger has remained well within his legal rights; like it or not, he's playing by the rules. It's the ethical call of the situation, though, that rings loudest and remains the damning variable in the court of public opinion.

Some simply can't see how Bulger isn't dragging the University along with him; that handling the reigns of a public institution carries with it the responsibility of a tell-all personal life. In an interview with The Boston Globe, union leader and library archivist at UMass-Boston Elizabeth Mock said, "We're disgusted and embarrassed. We work at a university, supposedly teaching young people to be honorable, to be ethical...It's a reflection on the university, and I find it troubling."

"As a sibling, we the people assume that blood obscures legality, that his pledge to silence is a sure-fire sign of something to hide."

Grace Fey, chairwoman of the board of trustees at UMass, said to the Globe, "It doesn't bother me, I think that's a personal matter. What I care about is that university business is accounted for."

Which leaves me. What do I think? While it's hard not to speculate based on the information we have – which is little – I find myself falling in line with Fey and those that are emphasizing University issues. The silence more deafening to me is Bulger's, during the times of trouble that are relevant to the student community. If the well-being of UMass is being passionately rallied for before legislators in Boston, it certainly hasn't been loud enough for those of us in the Valley to hear. If a new era under Chancellor John V. Lombardi is ushering in active change – and, as is the case, quite a bit of student interest and support – it's that much more frustrating when Bulger is spotted here only in the flash of a ribbon-cutting photo-op before returning to the city. Too often, we hear Bulger only through the press. Sound bites on television and statements shuttled off to the media. Allow him the legal and personal right to silence in his brother's case.

Instead, let's push for him to come clean on something more pertinent: you, me and the University he so quietly steers.

A lesson in perserverance learned from a wedding in Morocco

DAN YAGUDIN

[illegible] whomever. [illegible] in the Bronx for wedding, this is [illegible] synagogue, a working class suburb [illegible] of the Mediterranean Sea. The [illegible] of the groom, the name given [illegible] to a rite of passage in a [illegible] Sephardic version that is due [illegible] wedding of another major event is [illegible] Jewish holy text.

[illegible] catalogue that usually come with being [illegible] Morocco. Chances are you are Moroccan, [illegible] a million uncles and aunts, 80 [illegible] and 6 zillion relatives. Oh yes and [illegible] and [illegible].

[illegible] were all there in the synagogue, of [illegible] their future brothers or sisters in law as the [illegible] she read. And it's not as though there was really [illegible] of them. The synagogue itself was probably a [illegible] the size of the Student Union Ballroom. Still, that [illegible] hundreds and hundreds of family members and [illegible] and [illegible] spilled into adjacent streets.

The family that I was there with, good family friends, were about to celebrate their son's 15th birthday, when in Judaism he graduates from boyhood to manhood. The story of the family is reflective of the sad story of Arab Jews. For thousands of years, Jews indigenous to the Middle East inhabited the region, long before the birth of Islam or Christianity. Many of these communities were very ancient (the Iraqi Jewish community was established around 2,700 years ago). These Jews lived through thousands of years of conquests and re-conquests, princes, kings and sheiks, until 1948.

Following the creation of Israel in 1948, riots and mass expulsions caused the Jews of Iraq, Morocco, Algeria, Libya and other Arab countries to flee to – and subsequently double the population of – Israel. Our family friends, a mother, father and their 10 kids from the Moroccan city of Casablanca, got on a boat and made their way to Israel. There they found a country in its diapers that was too busy fighting invading Arab armies to help the hundreds of thousands of immigrants it was absorbing. The children were immediately put to work feeding the family's 12 mouths. College (and in some cases, finishing high school) was usually not an option. Sadly enough, the suffering and expulsion of these people has gone largely ignored by the world.

Back in the synagogue, the ceremony was underway, with the Rabbi calling the future groom to read the Torah. Suddenly a man in the back of the synagogue stood up and shouted "Rabbi! Rabbi! I have something to say!" He approached the front of the synagogue, where his future brother in law was standing. Much of the synagogue held its breath, except for a select few who knowingly grinned. The man took the future groom's hand, "to my future brother in law, I have just this to say," and with those words began a long chant in Arabic, to the beat of the congregation's clapping, about how happy he was that this was God's choice of a husband for his sister. In the end of the song, and over the wild cheers of all who witnessed the serenade, an old woman stood up and yelled, "Is the singer taken? Because if not, he's mine!"

In the words of one of the Arab Jewish refugees I met that day, the secret to these people's perseverance was that even when they didn't have a lot, they had happiness, and they always believed in God. And if nothing else, that spirit showed through in the synagogue. Between readings of the Torah people shouted, danced, sang, clapped and cheered in the spirit of the occasion. They were a people happy to be happy.

Most Arab Jewish refugees today are settled in Israel with their children, their grandchildren, and in some cases, their great-grandchildren.

The diligence of these people amazed me. Most of them were immigrants who came to the country with nothing and with huge families to care for. The property they left behind (billions of dollars worth, by some estimates) in their home countries was taken away from them, and they came to a country with a language that they did not speak. Despite the odds they prospered, multiplied (big time), and found their home in the land of the Jews. But that doesn't detract from the injustice done to them. I just hope that when people discuss the injustices of the Middle East conflict, that they don't forget Arab Jews, and the dignity with which they faced adversity.

Soderbergh bombs with sci-fi thriller Solaris

by Jake D. Lewis
COLLEGIAN STAFF

SOLARIS
Starring George Clooney and Natascha McElhone
Directed by Steven Soderbergh
Playing at Cinemark 12 in Hadley

George Clooney is the only redeeming and tolerable quality in Steven Soderbergh's recent chore, Solaris. Solaris failed to make the top-ten at the box office this weekend.

Popular director Steven Soderbergh has done it again.

Made a real stinker of a movie, that is.

I'm probably part of a minority when I say that I thought Traffic was one of the worst films I've ever seen, and even a smaller group of people who detested Erin Brockovich. Soderbergh had a temporary reprieve with last year's remake of Ocean's 11, but he has returned to his roots of tedium and tastelessness with his update of the semi-famous sci-fi film Solaris.

For the third time in five years, Soderbergh has teamed up with "ER's" George Clooney, with whom he also owns the production company Section Eight (the inspiration behind this past fall's dud Welcome to Collinwood). Clooney is a very likable actor, no matter what film he is in. There is something about his chiseled good looks and confident air that puts him the class of "movie star," the kind of actor that's not common anymore, mostly extinct since the days of Bogart. Hudson and Wayne (to name just a few). Indeed, Clooney has seemed to take on any role he might fall into with great talent – who would've thought that Dr. Doug Ross could also be a Gloucester fisherman, and then an escaped hillbilly convict a year later? Even more to the point, Clooney seems to have survived the David Caruso curse of leaving a hit TV show, making a string of bad movies and somehow managing to bounce back. Even with his dashing charm, sparkling charisma, and passion for the role on hand, the fate of Solaris is out of his hands and left in those of Soderbergh's, who is trying once again to make a really artsy film. He is not Stanley Kubrick. He's not even close to Steven Spielberg when the latter made the Kubrick-ian A.I. last year. No, Soderbergh's Solaris is closer to a space oddity than an adventurous work of filmmaking like the former's 2001.

Soderbergh's problem is this: he was a no-name director who made a splash in the 1980's with some independent films (namely sex, lies and videotape), and in the past few years, his career has been too stroked by critics and audiences. Because of that, he thinks that he ranks among Hollywood's favorite filmmakers. While his last film, Full Frontal, bombed, he could write that one off to the fact that it was an "independent" film, and also bad luck. Solaris might be the wake-up call he needs to get the point through his bespectacled head that he is not as cool and hip as he may think. Get into the mainstream pool, Stevie, or get out.

It is Soderbergh's doing that Solaris is so choppy and discombobulated. There was probably a fairly decent script at one point in the filmmaking process – traces of quality writing are sprinkled here and there – but instead of making the story a coherent and logical one, Soderbergh insisted on making it pretty instead. It is ironic that Soderbergh credits this cinematographs work to Peter Andrews, when, in fact, that is one of Soderbergh's aliases. He might as well take credit for the nice parts of the movie, rather than give a fake name just so the moviegoer doesn't think he is too cocky to list himself again.

But what of the story? From what I can tell, it's about a psychiatrist named Chris Kelvin (Clooney) who is dispatched to a space station hovering over the planet Solaris where things have gone awry. Soon upon his arrival, Kelvin begins seeing his wife, Rheya (the beautiful McElhone), which is troubling because she killed herself nearly three years prior. The painfully slow-moving plot concerns Kelvin trying to make sense of his own madness, which he thinks is fueled by the purple planet below him, along with the remaining crew members who suffer similar hallucinations. The "visitors" are so real, yet they cannot possibly be authentic. Or can they? Solaris offers some solution at its climax in a very Sixth Sense-ian sort of way, but I can't make heads or tails of it. If you can, let me know. Personally, I was so uninterested by the time the conclusion rolled around, I didn't give a hoot what it all meant. There's no sound in space for a reason, and that's because you can't hear a person watching this series of events scream for mercy.

While I'm not a huge fan of the notion to do an Ocean's 12, as is being discussed, I'm totally in favor of Clooney having to resort to some cliche set enjoyable piece of entertainment to remove the bad taste of Solaris from my palette. As for Soderbergh, I remain the same. Thought he was a hack originally, still do. If I had it my way, I'd have him on the first plane to that doubtless planet.

Ben Folds ups bar of musicality with the release of live album

By Meghan Healy
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

BEN FOLDS
Ben Folds Live
1 pic Records

One problem that listeners encounter time and again when hearing an artist's live album is that it seems to be never anything more than a greatest hits CD for that artist. Live albums tend to bring nothing new to the table and are often just a rehashing of radio favorites that have worked in concert. This is not the case with Ben Folds Live, the latest release from the musician of the same name.

Ben Folds' new live album is a collection of fan favorites along with a number of tracks that demonstrate his remarkable musical talent. The disc is a collection of songs from a handful of venues including The Calvin in Northampton, Roseland Ballroom in New York City and The Fillmore in San Francisco. Blending the proper balance of slow, piano ballads and rock inspired songs, Live takes the listener on a 17-track journey through the wondrous world of Ben Folds.

The disc opens with the raucous "One Angry Dwarf and 200 Solemn Faces." In this first track Folds reflects on his success and denounces all those who were less than kind to him in his childhood. "Remember second grade? Said you couldn't stand my face. Rather than kiss me you said you'd rather die. I'm big and important. One angry dwarf and 200 solemn faces are you. If you really want to see me check the papers and the TV. I took who's telling who what to do," he gloats.

Tracks such as "Army," "The Last Polka" and "Philosophy" truly showcase Folds' impressive ability as a pianist. His playing is fast and furious and seems to emanate from the piano without effort. "Army" gets the audience on its feet, with its speedy key successions and seemingly dissident melodies.

However, it is the ballads on Ben Folds Live that reveal the monstrous talent of this musician. Most anyone who owned a radio four or five years ago recall the mainstream success that Folds and his two other band mates had as trio Ben Folds Five with "Brick." The chilling song depicts the angst, anger, depression and the slew of other emotions a couple faces after getting an abortion. Before playing "Brick," Folds explains that it is an autobiographical tune with no political connotations to it.

Along with "Brick," Live is home to the brilliantly tranquil love song "The Luckiest." "Now I know all the wrong turns, the stumbles and falls brought me here. And where was I before the day I first saw your lovely face?" Folds asks, supported by his cathartic and calm piano playing.

Complimenting "Luckiest" is the endearing "Emaline" and the Elton John song "Tiny Dancer." Though it is a cover, "Tiny Dancer" seems to be a part of Folds' his rendition reflects his emotion and passion for piano in both his playing and intonation.

In addition to the disc of music, Live comes with a bonus DVD. The add-on includes 4four tracks that do not appear on the CD. Among these is Folds' revered break up anthem "Song For The Dumped." From the perspective of a jilted ex he sings, "it's easy to be easy and free when it doesn't mean anything. You remain selfless, cold and composed."

Also on the DVD is the song "Not The Same" about "where religion and drugs meet back on the other side" according to Folds. Viewers may recognize the venue this track was recorded at, as it is The Calvin Theater in Northampton. All the clips on the DVD, as well as on the CD, were recorded throughout the beginning half of 2002. These visuals are a nice touch for anyone who has never had the privilege of seeing Folds perform. It gives a face to the intensity that the listener hears, and compliments the live-show feeling the musical tracks evoke.

Ben Folds Live is definitely worth including in any CD collection. The disc is a great way for a Ben Folds novice to become familiar with the incredibly talented musician and is a valuable addition for an established fan. Live shows Folds's versatility as a lyricist and a musician while capturing all the magic of a real live show experience.

Ben Folds new album, Ben Folds Live, is an example of the immense talent and musical versatility of Ben Folds.

RUNNING with scissors
Episode VI: Holiday Presents

By Melissa Hammel and Lizzy Nielsen

How truly sad is this, the final installment of "Running with Scissors" for the semester. Don't fret; we'll be back to continue to aggravate the world with our shallowness next semester. Sadly, half of the genius behind this column will be flying south for the remainder of the school year. Perhaps we should think of a new name? We didn't think so.

Today we tackle the best and worst holiday gift ideas for women. Now, these types of things can apply toward any woman, whether it is your girlfriend, better-life mate, and sister, whatever. Most females are fairly easy to buy for; it is just necessary to put in a little thought. As always, the ladies of "Running with Scissors" exist only to point the men in a more positive direction to make this holiday season a more positive experience for everyone.

Gift Certificates Combined with Flowers
This is one of the easiest combinations in existence, and it is guarantee to make your woman smile. This type of gift is probably best if you don't know the woman that well, perhaps if you just started dating or if it is a gift for a female friend. Flowers are always a good idea, regardless of the occasion, and a gift certificate allows you to get more specific with your gift without actually having to purchase anything yourself. For example, try a Gap gift certificate if you think that the woman in your life needs some new clothing, or if you want things to heat up a bit for your girlfriend, try a Victoria's Secret gift certificate. Something like this combined with flowers makes a great holiday present.

Homemade Gifts
Homemade stuff is great if you are on a budget (like most of us are) or if you're looking to go that extra mile with the effort for the woman or women in your life. Some of the best gifts that we have ever gotten have been burned CDs and a plate of cookies from the main men in our lives. It's cheap, and it's guaranteed to bring a smile to her face. While it is always the thought that counts when it comes to purchasing gifts for the holidays, there are definitely ways that you can go wrong. Gifts that require little thought and little effort will reap few benefits in terms of gratitude. And now the bad gifts.

Exercise Equipment or a Gym Membership
While there might be some redeeming qualities to purchasing a membership to a gym or a brand new nautilus machine for the exercise fanatic on your list, don't bother. There is nothing worse than purchasing something that tells your loved one, "You're overweight" or that seems to ask that they spend more of the upcoming year improving themselves for you.

Ill Fitting or Inappropriate Clothes
Men should not be out buying women's clothes, period. Just leave the idea at the door. The sizes are totally different than the size range of men's clothes and the prices are about 10 times more expensive.

Furthermore, your chances for purchasing an item that the woman may actually like or wear is slim-to-none. Individuals have their own sense of style and unless you really know the other person well, you run the risk of buying something that will be returned on Dec. 26 or that she will keep out of politeness but never wear.

Overly Practical Gifts
Romance is the lifeblood of a relationship; it keeps it alive and running smoothly. Along these lines, romantic and sentimental gifts are often appreciated around the holidays. While a gift like flowers turns a woman's head, a gift like a vacuum cleaner, on the other hand, does the exact opposite. There is no reason to buy your significant other appliances as a gift this year. While she may have mentioned that she really needs a new set of hand towels for her bathroom, this is not the opportunity to explore the softer side of Sears and go out and buy them. Unless you are literally sharing a home, wait until you have been married a good 20 years before you invest in a set of dishes as a gift.

Food Purchased at a Mall Cart
The world would be a better place if the carts at the mall that sell things like cheese logs and giant chunks of meat were abolished forever. Besides being plain old unsanitary, keeping cheese outside of a refrigerator for hours at a time, it is also a gift that takes very little thought or time. This rule also goes for things like fruitcakes, which were appropriate at some point as a gift for your grandparents but even they have grown too old to be receiving them. As a general rule gifts that have a chance at getting your loved one sick should be avoided at all costs.

Presents that Are Really Meant For You
Don't think that women can't figure it out. There are certain circumstances in which men will go out and purchase gifts that they hope to use for themselves. That is to say if you get tickets for your favorite sporting event and give them to your significant other as a present, chances are pretty likely that she will realize that they are really for you. On the same vein, chances are she doesn't want Madden 2003 or a digitally enhanced version of Reservoir Dogs. Although it is in your best interest to drop hints that these gifts would be much appreciated for you, buying them for her will only irritate.

While we know that you will miss our witty commentars during your winter break, we will be busy coming up with new issues to dissect for your reading pleasure. Yes, we know that some of you hate us but as much as you can call us shallow, we are also right.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – What begins casually early in the day may become serious business before you are through. A friend or family member will want to take part.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You should be able to cloak an unpleasant truth today and keep others from becoming unduly upset by something they cannot control.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You must be careful today not to give people the wrong impression when you respond instinctively to certain extreme situations.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You must be willing to answer questions and make choices for yourself today. Your independence will be on the line, and you must stand firm.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Take care not to let your emotions rise to the surface too quickly and get the better of you. Your work will depend on objectivity.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Are you willing to step forward and tell others what you know? You must prepare to face the consequences either way. Trust your instincts.

Minutemen 'Cap' it off

MATT BRADY

An eerie silence overcame the Mullins Center. Boston University captain Freddy Meyer had just put a shot from the point home to put the visitors up 4-1 early in the second period. Massachusetts goalie Gabe Winer had allowed his fourth goal of the night on just the sixth Terrier shot he saw. To say the least, it didn't look good for the Minutemen.

"They just lost all of these fans for the rest of the season," one person on press row offered.

"If [the Minutemen] come back to win this game, I'm going to fire myself," another added.

The near 4,000 in attendance could have gotten up and left right then. They had seen this team lose before. They had taken their fair share of lumps from Hockey East powerhouses.

But they stayed.

And because they stayed, and because they believed, they were part of what was one of the most amazing moments in UMass hockey history.

But it wasn't just the game that made Friday special.

The Mullins Center, long regarded as a beautiful hockey facility that was often less than one-third full, became magical. Because 4,000 people refused to give up hope in a team that was making the steps toward becoming a top-notch hockey school, they got to experience something beautiful.

When Chris "Cap" Capraro netted the game-winning goal 4:14 into overtime, the sound that erupted from the crowd was near deafening. Public Address announcer Jack O'Neill did say, "Game-winning goal scored by number 25, Chris Capraro – unassisted."

But nobody could hear that announcement. Nobody could hear anything aside from the roar that came from the ball-filled Mullins Center. And nobody wanted to. They just wanted to revel in the pure unadulterated joy that came from watching a team from their school take it to the 13th-ranked Terriers over the final 35 minutes.

For most in attendance – it was the most overwhelming atmosphere for a hockey game at UMass.

"A lot of these people have waited a long time to see this," Minuteman Head Coach Don Cahoon said.

With all the excitement leading up to the game, people were actually expecting the Minutemen to top their nationally recognized visitors. And by turning a 4-1 deficit into a 5-4 victory, the Maroon and White gave most people in attendance an experience they will never forget.

Sure, there will be other huge wins for this program. The Minutemen will be in the top 15 – sometime in the near future. But the win that started the ball rolling took place Friday night in Amherst.

The Minutemen drew more than the announced attendance of 3,891 – and all of those who came to cheer for the Maroon and White went home satisfied. They knew that they were a part of what may have been a huge step toward establishing a hockey tradition at the flagship campus of the University of Massachusetts system.

It was a major step in making one of the most beautiful hockey arenas in the country one of the toughest places to play in the college game.

It was hockey in the Mullins Center. And it was beautiful.

Paul Tassone (No. 6) jumps for his mates to celebrate it with fellow teammates.

Ever had one of those moments when you're speechless?

Ever had a moment when you're so overwhelmed with emotion that you're not sure what to do?

Ever had a moment when you're so overcome with joy that you're not sure if you're going to laugh or cry?

Ever had a moment when you're so overcome with joy that you're not sure if you're going to laugh or cry, and you're not sure if you're going to laugh or cry because you're so overcome with joy?

I have.

It's 2:14 a.m. Saturday, and I'm sitting in the Boston College Fieldhouse press box watching the Eagles' men's basketball team play Fairfield University. I'm sitting here because I'm covering the game for the Collegian. I'm sitting here because I'm a sports writer. I'm sitting here because I'm a journalist.

I'm sitting here because I'm supposed to be writing a story about the game I'm watching.

I'm sitting here because I'm supposed to be writing a story about the game I'm watching, but I'm not writing a story about the game I'm watching because I'm not sure what to write.

I'm not sure what to write because I'm not sure what I'm feeling.

I'm not sure what I'm feeling because I'm not sure what I'm thinking.

people of the opposite sex in the same restroom, then they will fornicate," Boucher said.

"Well, I'd like to know where all the condoms are in the women's rooms," said Dziedzak.

"If you're in a dorm, with showers and stuff and there's that guy just standing there and looking you by normal means it's sexual harassment, but he's entitled to be there if it's his bathroom," said Kemmerer.

"My dad was here in the '70s with mixed restrooms and he said it worked," said Peterson. "They changed it to gender specific bathrooms. There's probably a reason for that."

During the three days that the Restroom Revolution had a table in the Campus Center, some of the representatives were met with hostility and more often confusion, according to the group members.

"Some people are just trying to figure out what we're doing," said Melissa Klatz '21, a UMass senior. "Some people made the effort to come over and understand."

"I think it's not my responsibility to justify my involvement. People don't need to know my history," Drzdzak said. "I don't think it's relevant at all."

So, how big a deal is this? How many transgendered people actually are there?

"It's ridiculous. There probably like four on campus," Peterson said.

"Our main problem is people don't know what we're about. They don't know what we stand for," said Boucher. "What really needs to happen is for people to know who we are and what we're doing here."

The future of University restrooms is still unclear. According to Crittenden, administration is looking into the "legal parameters of a gender neutral bathroom and see if there is any leniency in the plumbing code." Changing the assignment of already-created bathrooms to gender-neutral could be against code, depending if they can be counted as a part of the set number of fixtures in each building or not.

Crittenden said that administration will get back to the Restroom Revolution in January.

U.S. searching Iraq arms declaration for deception

By Jennifer Loven
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) – The Bush administration began searching Iraq's massive arms declaration for deceptions yesterday, promising no rush to judgment while professing "there's skepticism and there's fear" about Saddam Hussein's intentions.

The United States took the U.N. Security Council's only copy from New York to Washington to make duplicates for distribution to the council's four other permanent members.

Those four countries – Britain, France, Russia and China – agreed to let the United States handle the 12,000-page document because Colombia, which holds the presidency of the Security Council, was not able to copy it quickly enough in a secure location, a senior administration official said.

The United Nations could have done the work but its priority is censoring the dossier for sensitive material – such as bomb-making instructions – before handing it to the 10 non-permanent council members that do not have nuclear weapons, the official said. The extraordinary sensitivity of even the copying task required the declaration be flown to Washington, said Sean McCormack, a White House spokesman on national security issues.

"You just can't take it down to your neighborhood copying store," he said.

McCormack said any criticism that allowing sole initial access to the Bush administration – which some view as beating the drums for war against Saddam – could result in document-tampering would be "irresponsible."

The U.N. Security Council reversed itself Sunday and agreed to give its five permanent members complete, unsanitized copies.

U.S. experts were helping with the censoring, even as they began evaluating the document itself, two officials said.

Saddam, the Iraqi president, insists his regime has no programs for developing banned nuclear, biological or chemical weapons. President Bush says Saddam is lying.

"We are firm in our belief, in our knowledge that Iraq had these weapons of mass destruction, has had programs to maintain them and expand them, and still has these weapons of mass destruction," State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said.

Bush press secretary Ari Fleischer said "there's skepticism and there's fear about Iraqi intentions and abilities."

Under a U.N. Security Council resolution unanimously approved last month, international weapons inspectors are in Iraq trying to validate Saddam's claims along with the information his government submitted Saturday.

But even as U.S. officials continued to cast doubt on Iraq's broader claims, they insisted there would be no prejudgement of the validity of the Iraqi declaration.

considers Law the person best suited to fix the scandal.

"Were he to leave now, it would simply be in the lap of his successor to clear up these problems," said Doyle. "The cardinal, by staying, is really making a sacrifice for the church, allowing his future successor to come in with a clean slate."

Still, members of the Boston Priests Forum planned to meet later this week to draft a resolution calling for Law's resignation. Fifty priests have already signed a separate resolution asking Law to step down.

"The events of recent months and, in particular, of these last few days, make it clear to us that your position as our bishop is so compromised that it is no longer possible for you to exercise the spiritual leadership required for the church of Boston," reads the statement.

The crisis began in January, when previously secret church documents were released, showing that Law and other church officials allowed priests accused of sexually abusing children back into parish ministry, where many went on to abuse other children.

After an initial outcry for Law's resignation from victim support groups and others, Law appeared in recent months to be making strides toward restoring public confidence. He met with victims and a lay Catholic reform group that has been highly critical of him, and engaged in some of the routine public duties as head of the archdiocese.

But new priest personnel files released last week contained some of the most shocking allegations to date, and renewed calls for his resignation from priests, victims and Voice of the Faithful, a lay Catholic reform group.

"Most Catholics would be pleased to have him step down," said Bishop Joseph Imesch, of Joliet, Ill. "Unfortunately, people link what's happening in Boston to every other diocese in the country."

Whether Law stays or goes, it presents difficulties for the church.

If he stays, the Boston Archdiocese will continue roiling with discontent, since so many parishioners and clergy blame him for the scandal.

If Law resigns, it could fuel demands elsewhere for other church leaders to follow suit.

For instance, five bishops oversaw former Massachusetts priest John Geoghan, whose abuse case sparked the crisis, when they worked in Boston.

Those prelates – including Bishop Thomas Daily of Brooklyn, N.Y., and Bishop Robert Banks, of Green Bay, Wis. — have gone on to lead their own dioceses and continue to be dogged by questions over their past actions.

Former Boston Mayor Ray Flynn, who later served as ambassador to the Vatican, said he does not expect a quick decision from the Vatican.

"The Vatican will weigh and contemplate the issue," Flynn said.

Flynn said filing for Chapter 11 protection would be a "lose-lose option."

"I want the cardinal to stay here. I want to see this settled justly, and I never want to see this happen again," he said.

On Monday, while Law was in Rome, a national victims advocacy group called on the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops to publicly censure Law and to strip him of any positions with the conference.

Law is chairman of the bishops' international policy committee that last month drafted an anti-war resolution concerning Iraq.

New club looks to revolutionize UMass gaming

SADLY, THE SEMESTER IS ENDING AND THIS WILL BE THE FINAL INSTALLMENT OF MY VIDEO GAME COLUMN. BUT CHEER UP, KIDDIES, BECAUSE I HAVE SOME INTERESTING AND EXCITING NEWS REGARDING VIDEO GAMING AT THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS, INCLUDING INFORMATION ON WHAT COULD POSSIBLY BE THE BIGGEST GAMING EVENT TO HIT THE CAMPUS. TO STEAL A LINE FROM PRO-WRESTLER TRIPLE H, "IT'S TIME TO PLAY THE GAME."

Ever make a wish, but it just didn't come true? No matter how hard you want it to happen, things never go your way? Well, now it appears as if my wish has been granted, as there is now an official Electronic Gaming Club (EGC) at UMass. While there are still some minor flaws to fix within the club, it is definitely going to be one of the most popular new clubs by the end of the school year.

The club president, senior political science major Corey McCraw, has an excellent viewpoint on the future of the club he helped originate. With a set of basic rules and guidelines, McCraw has ensured safe gaming for the experienced and novice players. However, on the downside, this will be McCraw's last year at UMass. Nonetheless, he hopes to leave behind something to keep students happy for years to come.

"The reason why I wanted to form such a club is because I saw an interest," McCraw said. "And I have for years. After seeing other Registered Student Organizations (RSOs), I wanted to make the club official. I wanted to come back 10 years down the line and see that something I helped bring about is still flourishing."

The club's format is very plainly laid out with the basic rules one would expect to find in any organization: there's no tolerance for the gamer who enjoys cursing after every lost match or for those who steal or break the equipment. Everything is straightforward and easy to follow, but some have protested that there is no rule for being cheap. (In other words, using the same move over and over to win when it comes to

ANALYZE THAT
Directed by Harold Ramis
Starring Billy Crystal, Robert DeNiro, Lisa Kudrow and Joe Viterelli

Three years ago audiences were invited to theaters and entertained with the sight of mobster Paul Vitti (Robert DeNiro) sobbing his eyes out like a little girl while at the same time trying to stay alive in the New York Mafia. The 1999 comedy Analyze This succeeded in creating the hilarious setting of being a fly on the wall of a therapy session, combined with watching Dr. Ben Sobel (Billy Crystal) struggle to get away from his new patient and stay alive at the same time.

But that was then, and this is now. Director Harold Ramis returns with a twisted mangled corpse of a movie that needs to join Jimmy Hoffa, wherever he may be. Analyze That strays so far from the humor of the last film that the only thing left is joke overkill, a hugely depressing storyline and a strained attempt to bring the film closer to a drama or action with harsh lighting/dialogue and less than humorous chase scenes. The movie attempts to show the Mafia embracing Hollywood regardless that the success of the first movie was due in part to the incongruence of the Mafia lifestyle with so-deemed normal society.

So where did the first movie leave off? Oh, yes. Paul Vitti had been admitted to Sing Sing prison after swearing off a life of crime and becoming a "happy, well-adjusted gangster." Set the stage for Analyze That. Through the broadcast of a Sopranos-esque television program called "Little Caesar," the camera pans out to reveal a scheduled activity time back in good old Sing Sing. Assassination attempts have made the former crime lord a walking basket case. The assumed breaking point occurs in a cafeteria brawl, which leaves Vitti either singing West Side Story or left catatonically staring into space.

Quick jump to the funeral of Ben Sobel's father. This death is going to override the script at every turn, and there isn't any way of making it funny. The man's death sends the therapist into a crisis of identity like nobody's business and causes an eventual addiction to pills... because nothing makes one laugh harder than the death of a loved one combined with drug-addiction.

As soon as the doctor and his wife Laura (Lisa Kudrow) return home, they are met with F.B.I. agents who inform them of Mr. Vitti's deteriorating condition and his need for psychological treatment. Kudrow's character is kept as a bristling wife with less than two funny quips through the entire movie. And it really is a tragedy due to her extensive comedic background – which SUM 41'S LATEST ALBUM - DOES THIS LOOK INFECTED? - SHOWS THE BAND'S GROWTH AND DEVELOPMENT AS THE ARTISTS COME INTO THEIR OWN.

By Johnny Donaldson

SUM 41
Does This Look Infected?
Island

Sum 41, as the analogy often goes, is to Blink 182 as what Blink 182 is to Green Day. All Killer, No Filler, their 2001 debut album, was a compendium of young-punk brashness and snot-nosed humor reminiscent of the Blink boys. Filler was a slicker, faster Xerox – albeit a Xerox with a punk full of catchy pop-punk hooks.

With Does This Look Infected? the Sum boys – Deryck "Bizzy D" Whibley, Steve "Stevo32" Jocz, Dave "Brown Sound" Baksh and Jay "Cone" McCaslin – ascend to the level set by Green Day and Blink 182, rather than continue to sulk in the background as soundalikes. Like those influential new-punk bands, Sum 41's sophomore release effort is a more serious and (gasp!) mature effort, though the renowned party boys don't stray too far from their patented brand of PG-13 rock anarchy.

Like Blink did on last year's Take Off Your Pants and Jacket, Sum 41 tempers its smarty-pants tendencies, quick-blast pop and teen-angst lyrics with concessions to encroaching adulthood and reality. Hence, it's why Sum 41 can kick off Infected with "The Hell Song" – inspired by a friend's recent HIV diagnosis – and, five tracks later, provide "A.N.I.C." – a 35-second collection of hurled insults and epithets – more often than not unprintable. The song is reminiscent of the howling, attitudinal throttle of old school punk in its dirty, get-in-get-out bluster.

Sum 41's members have repeatedly said they wanted to go for a slightly heavier, more metallic vibe than they went with on Filler. And, in many respects, they have succeeded. Infected doesn't fly too far from the band's old pop-punk stomping grounds, but the foundations for their style of ultra-contagious rock merriment have deeper depths this time. The riffs are meatier, Jocz's percussive drumming chunkier and the elfin looking Whibley sounds more confident as front man. The band,

Pat McGee, featuring his acoustic guitar, and band to play at UMass

This began in 1996 as a grassroots band. Pat McGee, playing his acoustic guitar and lead vocals, heads the band, with bass player John Small, piano player and vocalist Jon Williams, electric guitar talent Brian Fechino, drummer Chris Williams and percussionist Chardy McEwan backing him up. The group has traveled across the United States, initially touring Mid-Atlantic and Southeast college campuses, and now the band makes its way to the University of Massachusetts for a one-night engagement this evening at the Student Union Ballroom.

The Pat McGee Band has toured and performed with many well-known artists, including the Allman Brothers Band, Sister Hazel, Barenaked Ladies and Shawn Mullins, gaining critical praise along the way.

"While Pat showcases his master acoustic guitar talents, the band as a whole demonstrates a unique harmony, great percussions, strong lyrics and a wide range of emotions and styles," said Taryn Patterson, a student publicist for University Productions and Concerts. "Revel, the debut album of Pat McGee Band, was released in 1997 with some electric guitar added to the acoustic mix. This release showcased the vocal harmonies that are a favorite of fans of the live shows."

The band, said to have taken influence from artists James Taylor, the Allmans, Led Zeppelin, Bruce Springsteen, Grateful Dead and Fleetwood Mac, among others, also announces its latest recording news – to return to Warner Brothers' studio on Dec. 2 to complete the recording for their new album.

The band performs at 8 p.m. Tickets cost $5 for college students and $15 for the general public. Contact Tix Unlimited.

Sum 41

which patently fast-track punk with their glitter gone on Pain Tell Pleasure. The Tenor play Boys's homage to Lawrence Welk will be Maiden.

All this means Sum 41 let Guyanese Iron Balls serve My Amsterdam quickly before doing the standard pop-punk song in a timid ding-hamming chord to mull 90. About two and a half minutes in, Jocz and Baksh let loose and it's all solos - beer-fueled absurdity along while Baksh delivers a strumming accompaniment. Baksh lets loose on half-th, tracks displaying the kind of prideful throwmanship that has gotten him to the real guttural sludge down turned guitars. The guitarists have a nice-cut skill and with time and practice him sell the kind of axeman garage rocking teenagers try to imitate at the wail on the stringer in earnest.

The rapping from "EAT LIP" their glorious Beatlesque first single, returns on "Thanks for Nothing" though the song lacks the demented sort-of-glamour that launched them. There are times when Sum 41 channel Social Distortion rockers. The Offspring more than any other modern punk rock band. The song "No Brain" and "Mr. Anti-Social" especially has the Orange County affect to rails pummeling and the veteran Orange County punk rockers have become known for.

"Fat, Half Song" "My Direction" and "All Messed Up" have the irreverent, infantile attitude books the best pop-punk is known for.

If there is any weakness on Does This Look Infected? it may come from the lyrics. Vague references abound to hypocrisy, pain, dishonesty, heartbreak and the other negative things in their young audiences life. When Whibley sings "Cause I'm all messed up, making perfect non-sense, drowning in my doubt" or "Now I'm in! over my head, with something I said completely misread I'm better off dead" it comes off as a bit too glib to be taken seriously.

The best loving jokers who pay pass tribute to George Romero in their album booklet don't convince listeners with the lyrics. However Sum 41 could be singing the yellow pages with music this consummate. While its pop smart hooks. Does This Look Infected? ranks as one of the best albums of the year.

lighting games). While there is no official rule, the club does intend on enforcing the policy when it comes to serious tournaments and so on.

There is one key thing that brought McCraw and the other UGC members together – the one thing to rule them all, kind of like Lord of the Rings, if you will: Tekken 4. If that arcade game was not in the Campus Center arcade, there may not have been a club at all. At the first meeting, new UGC members played five straight hours of Tekken 4 on two television sets, and it's definitely become one of the clubs most popular games to play at weekly meetings.

At the second meeting, I was able to host a quick tournament the winner being awarded a brand new PS2 game. The competitors played the new Mortal Kombat Deadly Alliance, which is by far one of the most entertaining games in the MK series, and UGC treasurer Tam Nguyen took home the prize.

Following the tournament, the members discussed what would possibly be the biggest push for the club, a tournament to be held at UMass next semester in the classic format from the Fred Savage movie The Wizard. The popular response to the idea was positive, as ideas and dates will be discussed next semester. The idea is to possibly have Nintendo sponsor the tournament and provide systems, prizes and entertainment, etc. For now, the entry fee is $10 to enter.

Club officers suggest all wishing to enter the tournament brush up on their old school games, if you know what I mean. Club members will not be able to participate unless McCraw grants them permission. All interested in helping are encouraged to attend the last meeting of the semester, which will be held on Thursday at 8 p.m. in the Campus Center arcade.

Analyze That

COMEDIAN BILLY CRYSTAL GETS CAUGHT IN A GARBLED PLOT INVOLVING THE DEATH OF HIS FATHER IN THE SEQUEL TO ANALYZE THIS.

stretches back further than "Friends" with her beginnings in a California improv comedy troupe over 15 years ago.

The film goes into a fiery tailspin from there, as the doctor is charged with looking after his former patient until his parole hearing in a few weeks. It turns out the mental illness was a ruse to spring the hardened criminal from his cell and get back into his former life. This plot could have worked; it could have been funny, but somehow it just wasn't. And it isn't just the lack of jokes that caused the movie to drown. The very ambiance of these scenes screams a dramatic harshness – as opposed to the softer lighting/colors used in the first film.

Eventually, Dr. Sobel discovers Paul Vitti is nothing without crime. He lines up a series of legal jobs for him to try, but somehow auto sales, seating host of a local Italian restaurant and even an eventual position as creative consultant on the ever-popular "Little Caesar" series can't satisfy the reformed mobster and his ties to the family remain.

New factor in a new subplot: somehow a widow named Patty LoPresti (Cathy Moriarty) has inherited control of the family and is determined not to let anyone take that away from her. Fine. No one has any problem with this new character introduction – but for crying out loud, could the director please tie it in logically? LoPresti's character didn't even have a cameo in the first movie, and now suddenly she's running one of the most powerful underground crime families in the world? Somewhere along the creative process, one should realize a line is being crossed.

The basic problem with Vitti's life at this point is no one in the crime family wants to believe the former boss is out of the game for good. Eventually, one last heist is planned with Vitti as the leader and Sobel in tow. Twenty-two million dollars worth of gold bars are to be stolen from a bank and taken back from the family. The action at this point is mixed with Dr. Sobel's realization of the depth of Vitti's grief at having lost his father at a young age. The two men, swaying in each other's arms while the police attempt to take back the stolen gold, ends up oddly placed and contains as much humor as a severed horse head on a pillow.

Suffice it to say harmony is soon restored to both men's lives. Complete details will be left in the shadows in case there are a few die-hard fans who feel like wasting two hours of their lives to see this desperate attempt at humor. No one blames Harold Ramis for what went on during this movie, but for the sake of DeNiro and Crystal fans everywhere, a trilogy better not be in the works.

All Analyze That accomplished was over 90 minutes of two great actors in the wrong place at the right time. Save yourself the trouble, and go watch a hobbit or a wizard this holiday season, because there isn't any reason you should shell out money for something so weak. Better yet, go rent the original version. The first movie was infinitely better than the second, and the only words I can say to the director run something like, "You broke my heart Ramis; you broke my heart." UMass takes 200 relay at Nutmeg Invite

By Reid Davenport
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On the weekends, most college students waste away their mornings sleeping or watching television.

The Massachusetts women's swimming team was in a different position, as most of its members were diving and swimming away the early morning and late evening hours. This weekend marked the Minutewomen's first showing at the Nutmeg Invitational in New Haven, Conn. The team was able to place multiple swimmers in the top five spots for each event, including a first-place finish in the 200-yard relay.

In that event, the Minutewoman 'A' team of Lauren Rowell, Christen Dexter, Diana Alberti and Lizzy Boyle took first. The UMass 'B' team, made up of Colleen Wasson, Melissa Stango, Lauren Bulkeley and Molly Buckley came in fifth out of nine. Rounding out the top four following the Minutewomen were Yale 'A' in second, UConn 'A' third and Yale 'B' fourth.

"The meet went really well," Boyle said. "This was a huge meet for the team and was a big confidence boost for us toward the Atlantic 10s. We normally do not do well on the first day, but this time we did really well. Plus, everyone really stepped up at the morning meets and did just as well at night.

"This meet was not as tiring as it sounds," she continued. "We have been training for better stamina, so we are not tired when the third day of meets arrives. Our work in practice definitely showed through the results of the meet. The Atlantic 10s will not be as bad because we get a decent amount of time to rest and take it easy before them."

After a strong showing over the weekend, the team will get a day rest on Monday, but it will be back in the pool on Tuesday and will be practicing all through finals week. The break does not start for the team after finals week, as the Minutewomen will be required to do their own practicing while they are home for the weeks following finals.

The Maroon and White will dive back into competition on Jan. 4, when they head to San Juan, Puerto Rico for the Sacred Heart Invitational.

and anchored some relays for us while winning his individual events. All indications show that he's right on track to having a stellar senior year."

The UMass relay teams have been competitive in every race and have been successful all season. With a victory and a second place finish to its credit, Yarworth feels his team's attitude is a major contributor.

"Our team atmosphere is one thing we recruit on," Yarworth said. "When you come here, you are an UMass swimmer for life. That team attitude and cohesiveness certainly helps with relays."

Yarworth feels this team-first attitude is a key factor to UMass' hopes of repeating as Atlantic 10 champions.

Buck Buchanan finalist investigated over steroids

MAINE'S STEPHEN COOPER IS BEING INVESTIGATED FOR POSSESSION OF STEROIDS FOLLOWING A TRAFFIC STOP LAST MONTH.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ORONO, Maine – Maine linebacker Stephen Cooper is being investigated for possession of steroids after police found 1,000 pills during a traffic stop last month.

Cooper acknowledged to police that the pills were steroids, said Stephen McCausland, spokesman for the Maine Department of Public Safety. The pills were seized and the case was referred to the U.S. attorney's office.

No charges have been filed, and federal prosecutors would not comment on the investigation.

The driver of the vehicle Cooper was stopped Nov. 1 for speeding on Interstate 95 in Hampden, Maine, McCausland said. The state trooper searched the vehicle after obtaining permission from the driver, Patrick Kenney, and Cooper. The pills were found in plastic bags in a duffel bag, McCausland said.

Anabolic steroids, which increase muscle mass, are illegal in the United States unless prescribed by a doctor for medical reasons. Their use is banned by the NCAA.

Neither coach Jack Cosgrove nor athletic director Paul Buhb would comment on the accusation Monday. Maine lost to Georgia Southern 31-7 in the second round of the NCAA Division I-AA playoffs.

The trooper, Michael Johnston, notified the university's director of public safety about the incident soon after it took place, McCausland said.

Bubb said it was only Monday that the university learned from the media about the allegations. Bubb said 26 members of the Black Bears football and track and field teams randomly were tested for steroids last month, and none of the tests came up positive.

A two-time Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year, Cooper was named recipient of the Gridiron Club of Greater Boston's George H. "Bulger" Lowe Award as the top defensive player in New England.

Despite missing two games because of an ankle injury, the 6-foot-1, 230-pound senior from Wareham, Mass., went into Saturday's game with 110 tackles, including 70 solo, and 9 1/2 sacks.

RAHEEM LAMB AND THE REST OF THE MINUTEMEN WILL HAVE THEIR HANDS FULL WHEN THEY TAKE ON NO. 9 UCONN TONIGHT.

Robertson, Talick Brown and Ben Gordon.

Gordon is averaging just a shade over 20 points per game (ppg) from the starting 2-guard spot, while Robertson is backing him up with 12 a game. Brown is scoring at just over 10 a clip, but is most effective dishing the ball off, distributing over seven assists per game.

Cox (6.2 ppg) and fellow guards Anthony Anderson (7.2 ppg) and Mike Lasme (9.0 ppg) will have their hands full in the backcourt, but what worries coach Steve Lappas the most is the situation on the blocks.

"We've been taken apart by some of the bigger guys we've faced," Lappas said. "But there's some things we can do down low."

Through five games, nobody has figured out what to do with 6-foot-9 pivot Emeka Okafor. The sophomore was a man-child in the paint last year against the Minutemen dropping 15 points and six blocks as a freshman. He's increased his offensive production to 19.2 ppg and has remained a force on defense with 5.8 blocks per contest.

Senior co-captains Micah Brand and Jackie Rogers will likely share time against Okafor. Rogers matches up well in terms of strength and athleticism, but at 6-foot-11 Brand has three inches on the Husky center.

Still, Lappas maintains that "we match up pretty good with them."

That said, UConn hasn't suffered a loss in this annual contest since 1993, making it hard to call the game a rivalry.

"We're not a rivalry with them until we beat them," UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "It's got to start to go back and forth. Then we can call it a rivalry."

Until that happens, the game lacks in luster. MassMutual bailed out on sponsorship because of the one-sided nature of recent games and ESPN will not televise the contest this year.

Lappas fully admits that the UMass program is not at a point where it is ready to consider a perennial power such as UConn a legitimate rival. But the reality is that right now the Minutemen are a team desperate for an upset.

"I want to develop this into a rivalry," Lappas said. "But first we have to win."

CLEO FOSTER AND THE MINUTEWOMEN ARE OFF TO THEIR BEST START SINCE 1998.

Just as the two did against Rhode Island, the dynamic duo of Butler and Smith dominated the New Hampshire Wildcats from the field and – what made their coach even happier – from the line.

The co-captains combined for 37 of the 70 points the Minutewomen scored in the win. They went a perfect 13-of-13 from the charity stripe.

Butler was in foul trouble late in the game but her teammates were able to pick up the slack as she went to the bench.

"Nekole and Ebony [Pegues] really stepped up and showed their senior leadership when Ien had to sit," Dacko said. "You can see how things are coming together for us the way that the team was able to rally around Ien's early departure."

Massachusetts cruised through the contest en route to the 20-point victory.

"Today was an excellent all-around performance," Dacko said. "I was especially pleased with our defensive effort. We pressured hard at times and forced UNH out of its offense. It was nice for these kids after what happened last year at the Mullins Center."

BC upends UMass

By Jim Pignatiello
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BC	80
UMass	62

The problems that plagued the Massachusetts men's basketball team in its first four games were displayed to a national audience in Saturday's 80-62 loss to Boston College, which dropped the team to 1-4.

On ESPN, the Minutemen were repeatedly demeaned inside, giving up 21 offensive rebounds and 46 points in the paint, including 30 in the second half.

"[We were] physically manhandled inside and physically manhandled outside. The game really turned on the glass," UMass coach Steve Lappas said after the game. "Even in the first half, when we were playing well, I thought [BC's] offensive rebounding is really what changed everything around."

UMass' starting five continued its struggle to score, combining for just 24 points on the afternoon. The backcourt duo of juniors Anthony Anderson and Marcus Cox particularly struggled, shooting 2-for-13 for just five points.

Coming out of halftime with a 34-28 lead, Boston College sprinted out of the gate with a 14-2 run from which Massachusetts never recovered. Of the six baskets scored in the streak, five were layups.

"The main thing is we have to play hard for the whole game," UMass center Micah Brand said. "At the beginning of the second half, we came out and everybody's intensity was still up and they went on a little run and we lost a little bit of intensity."

The Minutemen jumped out to a 7-0 lead early behind the inside presence of forward Jackie Rogers, who scored seven of the team's first nine points. But BC quickly cut the deficit with a 10-2 run sparked by a pair of three's from All-American candidate Troy Bell.

The game went back and forth through most of the first half until the Eagles took a 26-24 lead on a jam by Bell.

BC never trailed again.

In the contest, Lappas saw firsthand what a star player, something he is currently lacking, can do for a team.

"They have a really good player in Troy [Bell] and when you have a really good player it makes everybody else better," Lappas said. "One of our things right now is, who is our best player? That's a question. They don't have that question. They haven't had that question for four years. And that makes a difference."

There were few bright spots in the game, but the play of rookies Gabe Lee and Mike Lasme gave the Minuteman faithful a look at the future of UMass basketball.

Lee was one of two Minutemen to reach double digits with 11 points on a perfect 4-for-4 performance from the field.

Lasme tried to take charge as the Eagles began to pull away. The Ivory Coast native was apprehensive at the beginning of the game, but was inspired by a previous loss.

"I was actually thinking about the loss to Central Connecticut," Lasme said. "That's what I had on my mind.

"I was a little nervous at the beginning," he added.

But once Lasme got comfortable, his explosiveness single-handedly gave the 6,342 in attendance one last hope of a close game. No. 1 made two free throws to cut the lead to 50-34 with 14 minutes left in the contest and seemed to find his rhythm there.

Minutes later, Lasme drilled one from downtown. On the next time down the court, he hit another. Next time down, he hit another. As the crowd roared approvingly, the score had only been cut to 59-45. Boston College had answered the one-man show with two layups and a three.

After the game, Lasme was asked if he was trying to carry the team on his shoulders. His answer?

"Definitely."

Bell led all scorers with 21 points on 6-for-16 shooting. He added a 7-for-8 performance from the charity stripe.

Guard Ryan Sidney chipped in with 18 points (9-for-14) and six boards, while Craig Smith (12 points, six boards) was productive inside with a 6-for-6 shooting performance.

Cox and mates set to take on Huskies

By Matthew F. Sacco

Marcus Cox can't help but laugh when somebody asks him about UConn. It's not that he's trying to be rude, but he's heard this tune before. It started over a month ago when the former Husky began his first season at New England rival UMass.

Since then there's been no shortage of media-generated speculation on how Cox will fare when he faces his former team. The speculation will end tonight at the Hartford Civic Center when No. 9 (ESPN/USA Today) Connecticut hosts the Minutemen.

"It's finally here," Cox said after practice yesterday. "But it's not about Cox vs. UConn. It's a game we've all been looking forward to."

Despite some unnecessary comments UConn coach Jim Calhoun has lobbed against Cox recently, the junior combo guard remains unfazed.

"I'm not the type of player that would try to do too much," he explained. "I know how coach Calhoun is. It doesn't bother me. I've been going through it since I was there."

Still, Cox will be going back to the Civic Center in front of a hostile crowd, as a Connecticut kid playing for the opposition.

"Obviously Marcus Cox is going to have some emotions," UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "Maybe that will give him the extra edge to play well."

And he'll need to perform to give the Minutemen a shot at the undefeated Huskies. A 1-4 record to the open the year – with the lone win against Division II Chaminade – has the Minutemen eager to get back on the hardwood.

But it won't be easy, as Calhoun boasts one of the most well rounded offenses in the country, with four players averaging double-digits in points. It starts with the Big East's best backcourt in Tony

Six place first at Yale Invitational

Swimming is a sport that requires an athlete to push every muscle in their body to maximum capacity. When you have to do this for three straight days, you could face stamina and fatigue by the last swim if you aren't up for the challenge. Coach Russ Yarworth knew how to present the challenge to his team.

"The way we approached this invitational as kind of a dress rehearsal for the A-10 championships, which is a three-day, four-final format," Yarworth said. "You basically have to swim six sessions, and you might [swim] two times per session. So, you are looking at 12 swims over three days."

"Preparation is mental. You have got be ready to accept the challenge. Then, you have got to be ready to accept the fatigue and still swim hard on day three."

From Dec. 6-8, the Massachusetts men's swim team competed in the Yale Invitational. The Minutemen were able to come away with six first-place, three second-place and three third-place finishes, respectively.

The outstanding performances for the Minutemen came from senior Rob Bellamy and the relay teams.

Bellamy posted an impressive line for the first two days with individual wins in the 200-yard and 500-yard free-style, while anchoring the 800-yard freestyle relay team to victory. Bellamy also earned second-place in the 400-yard freestyle relay. On the third and final day, he capped off his performance finishing third in the 100-yard freestyle.

"Rob has been pretty determined. He wasn't satisfied with his junior year performance, even though I thought he had a pretty good year," Yarworth said.

"He's really taken it upon himself to work as hard as anyone and his performance this weekend reflected that," Yarworth added. "He's a good, tough swimmer

Minutewomen cruise to 6-1

Seniors Smith, Butler key in pair of victories

By Glen Straub
COLLEGIAN STAFF

You have to go back to the era of Afros, disco balls and trailblazers to find a Massachusetts women's basketball team that has started the season as well as this year's has.

After winning its first Atlantic 10 conference game of the year against Rhode Island in Kingston, R.I., 59-45, last night and easily handling a 2-3 New Hampshire club in Durham, N.H. Saturday afternoon, 70-50, the Minutewomen have started the 2002-03 campaign with a 6-1 overall record under new coach Marnie Dacko.

URI	45
UNH	50

The impressive opening mark is the best start from a UMass squad since the 1978-79 team that opened out of the gates at 6-1 and finished with a 18-7 record.

The wins keep on coming thanks in part the resurgence of a once fallen star of the Maroon and White – forward Nekole Smith. Her stellar play was never more evident than in the Minutewomen's win over URI (6-1, 0-1 A-10) at the brand new Ryan Center.

Smith scored a game-high 18 points, 14 of them coming in the second half. She not only was able to knock down baskets, but helped the usual loner under the boards, center Jen Butler, by grabbing a season-high eight rebounds against the Rams.

It was Rhode Island's first loss of the year, but it seemed as if UMass was the team that came in with an undefeated record.

The Minutewomen jumped out to an early 12-0 lead four minutes into the game. Like many times this season, the defense of the Minutewomen held the Ram offense to minimal production.

URI shot a measly 27 percent from the field in the contest, which proved to be extremely beneficial for UMass, as it only shot 41 percent in the game.

"It was an ugly game," Dacko said. "We knew they were going to pressure us and deny the wings and we couldn't stop it."

Despite the poor shooting from the Maroon and White, it was able to build a commanding lead. The Minutewomen led by as many as 14 in the first half, and at halftime they were up 28-18.

In the second half, UMass continued to increase its lead behind the play of Smith and Butler. Butler finished the game with 14 points and 11 rebounds. The double-double was her fifth of the season and 46th of her four-year career.

The Minutewomen built a 21-point lead midway through the second, but sloppy play and missed defensive assignments allowed Rhode Island to slowly creep back into the game as they moved within 12 at the 2:21 mark of the second half.

The Rams were able to stay in the game despite the fact that their leading scorer, guard Shayla Johnson – who is averaging 16.8 points per game this season – went 0-for-7 from the field and finished the contest with only four points.

"I think we were up by 20 and then the discipline factor kicked in," Dacko said. "We lacked the kind of execution necessary to blow this thing wide open."

After URI came within 12, UMass responded and allowed only one point in the final two minutes en route to its 12th win in 14 meetings with the Rams.

SGA wraps up semester

By Kristin Shrewsbury
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Members of the Student Government Association Senate will meet tonight for their last meeting of the semester.

The Senate will be working on trying to pass the last motions of the 2002 fall semester. The motions arising tonight will involve changes in the SGA constitution and by-laws will be discussed. Issues surrounding some of the University of Massachusetts' recent decisions will also be on tonight's agenda.

After much debate over the recent implementation of Max the police dog, members are facing tough decisions as to what is to come in the future. The Senate and its leadership have stated mixed feelings of a police dog at the University.

"Chuck DiMare from Student Legal Services and I are going to be meeting with Vice Chancellor Vanin and Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor about the issue," Speaker Dan Saunders said. "We really hope this was just a miscommunication."

Members of the Senate will also be reviewing the recent results and suggestions submitted in an Alcohol Task Force survey of the University. Members expressed concern at the last Senate meeting based on the University's lack of student input. A motion suggesting a possible new task force that would involve more students will also be up for debate.

Chair of University Policy Blake Kleppe addressed the Alcohol Task Force's response to the University at the Senate's last meeting. He explained that they did not allow freshmen to move into pre-approved Greek houses second semester of their freshman year, as well as the possibility of implementing substance-free residence halls on campus.

"A lot stuff is happening that students aren't aware of and the administration is not making an extra effort to let students know, so we're going to try and have something written up for students when they get back," Saunders said.

"I know the alcohol task force called for no pre-approved housing but if the administration is working for us, maybe we can get their proposal thrown out and get a new task force developed with students," Kleppe said. "We should have the utmost say in that, so we are going to be working on that."

Aside from the issues within the Senate, the SGA has also been faced with issues regarding the current situation of UMass President William Bulger. Bulger, who was subpoenaed to court to testify on behalf of his brother "Whitey" Bulger, has sparked debate over his role in the University. Members of the SGA addressed the issue by explaining that they feel Bulger's subpoena to court has nothing to do with the University, but issues that took place years before. Members of the SGA further explained that they felt taking action by a vote of no confidence would not be in order at this time.

"I think right now we're just waiting to see what happens. Right now it's not effecting the University and we're not going to call a vote of no confidence, if it becomes larger then well take a deeper look at it," Saunders said. "This is something that happened way before he got here and right now we have so many other issues that we're looking at, that Bulger is low on our list."

As the Senate meets tonight to address the last issues of the year, members will be looking to next semester and what changes need to be made on campus. Saunders talked about issues that the SGA is planning to work on over the winter, one being that it will get more information out to the students about what is taking place on campus.

"We're exploring new ways to get information out to the students."

The Senate will convene tonight at 7 p.m. in room 174 of the Campus Center.

Forum discusses students' rights to free speech

By David Grant
COLLEGIAN STAFF

An underground newsletter, a controversial school policy and what constitutes free speech were the topics discussed last night in a filled instruction room at Amherst Regional High School.

The forum comes amidst an ongoing controversy over a "freedom of speech" policy that was adopted in reaction to the suspension of a student over the content in "The Crux," an underground newsletter published and distributed by senior Max Karson.

Now, some parents and students are questioning the policy, saying it hinders the right to free speech.

According to school officials, "The Crux" graphically describes masturbation, takes aim at school officials and diversity programming, names a student in a sexual context and talks about the publisher's own sexuality.

The forum, sponsored by the Amherst Regional High School Parent Center, was moderated by Lisa Kent, a member of the organization.

Guest speakers David Schimmel, a University of Massachusetts School of Law expert and Jeffrey Pyle, a lawyer who specializes in First Amendment and media law, discussed the First Amendment law and their views on free speech.

"The material has to be obscene and cause a material disruption and interfere with the rights of others who have the right to be left alone," Schimmel said.

Teachers think the newsletter is obscene, pornographic, racist and deeply disturbing, Kent said.

"I have read 'The Crux' and certainly think it has literary merit," Pyle said. "Vulgarity is in the eyes of the beholder."

The suspensions were all overturned, leaving the school and the community confused about the policy and its effectiveness to control what is distributed in school.

After the second suspension in September school officials adopted a school policy that allows "freedom of expression" removing the requirement to submit published material before it is distributed. The new policy "encourages all students to submit the material before its distributed."

The policy states that it prohibits the distribution of material that causes disruption is vulgar and considered obscene.

"Who decides what is considered obscene?" one parent asked. "My senior doesn't have a problem with it, but my freshman does," the parent said, talking about her two daughters that attend the school.

"It's a gray area, not a black and white issue," Kent said.

Kent said that is the reason the parents center opted for the forum. The mission of the center is promoting the well-being of the student body and stimulating discussion in the community.

United Nations accused of trying to stir up war

By Charles J. Hanley
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) – The Iraqi government accused Washington on Tuesday of taking control of a U.N. master copy of Baghdad's arms declaration in order to tamper with it and create a pretext for war.

The White House dismissed Iraq's accusation that it altered the documents. Specialists at the CIA and other U.S. agencies began poring over the 12,000-page declaration, in which Baghdad is supposed to "tell all" about its chemical, biological and nuclear programs. American officials said much of the material appeared to be recycled versions of earlier documents. U.N. inspectors have said Iraq's earlier declarations were incomplete. The United Nations was beginning its own analysis of the mammoth declaration, a process officials say could take weeks.

Inspectors stepped up their search Tuesday, fanning across Iraq on surprise missions to 13 sites – the largest number of inspections since the U.N. operation resumed two weeks ago. One team moved in on a uranium mining site 250 miles west of Baghdad.

President Saddam Hussein, meanwhile, spoke of war and sacrifice in a meeting with top lieutenants, men U.S. strategists hope will abandon the Iraqi strongman in the event of war. "Your heads will remain high with honor, God willing, and your enemy will be defeated," he was shown on state television telling defense officials, including Defense Minister Lt. Gen. Sultan Hashim Ahmed.

U.S.-Iraqi tensions flared again in the southern "no-fly zone" Tuesday, when the U.S. command said its warplanes bombed an Iraqi anti-aircraft missile site 165 miles southeast of Baghdad. Just across Iraq's southeastern border in Kuwait, U.S. Army units were conducting desert exercises.

Iraq insists it no longer has weapons of mass destruction or programs to make them. The Bush administration says it's sure Baghdad does and has threatened war if, in the U.S. view, Saddam's government doesn't comply with U.N. disarmament demands.

Secretary of State Colin Powell denounced Saddam's claims, saying: "He's a liar."

"We'll see now whether he decides that the cost of lying is too great. The cost of lying now might result in his regime being destroyed by the armed forces of the international community," he said during a Dec. 5 interview with the French television station France 2. The State Department released the transcript Tuesday.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said the U.S. analysis of Iraq's declaration would be "deliberative" and "careful" in order to "understand what it is that Iraq is purporting to declare, as well as what they have failed to declare."

Two copies of the Iraqi documents were delivered to U.N. headquarters in New York late Sunday, one to the Security Council and the other to the U.N. Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission.

The complex declaration describes Iraq's former chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programs, and details hundreds of so-called dual-use sites in Iraq, whose products or equipment can be alternated between civilian and military uses.

Around midnight Sunday, the council's lone copy left the building in U.S. hands, supposedly because only the U.S. government could photocopy thousands of pages in secure surroundings. The transfer, which occurred before any other governments could examine the Iraqi reports, had the approval of the council's current president, Ambassador Alfonso Valdivieso of Colombia.

The master copy was in U.S. hands for most of Monday, before copies were distributed to other council members. Official Iraqi reaction was swift.

"This is unprecedented extortion in the history of the United Nations, when it (the United States) forced the president of the Security Council to give it the original copy of Iraq's declaration," the Iraqi Foreign Ministry said in a statement faxed to news organizations.

It accused Washington of "possibly forging what it wants to forge."

"This American behavior aims to play with the United Nations' documents with the aim of finding a cover for aggression against Iraq," it said.

Fleischer said the Iraqi criticism was yet again rejecting the United Nations, since the process was approved by U.N. members. "That is a laughable statement," he said in Washington.

The U.N. monitoring operation received reinforcements Tuesday when 28 new inspectors flew in, expanding the staff to 70. Chief inspector Hans Blix says he expects to have 100 in place by the end of the year.

The inspectors visited a variety of sites Tuesday, including chemical and explosives facilities, and veterinary medicine institutes, whose vaccine-making processes were applied in the past to biological weapons-making.

The uranium mining operations at al-Qaim, also known as Akashat, located in the desert near the Syrian border, were scrutinized by U.N. nuclear inspectors in the 1990s. Its phosphate deposits were exploited in the 1980s for their uranium content as well as for fertilizer, producing some 100 tons of uranium over six years.

A U.N. statement said the unannounced inspection was to verify "the status of destroyed equipment (and) to determine that no uranium extraction activities have been resumed."

Inspections in the 1990s led to the destruction of tons of chemical and biological weapons, and to the dismantlement of Iraq's nuclear weapons program. The inspections were halted in 1998 amid U.N.-Iraqi disputes, and the inspectors have returned under a tougher U.N. Security Council resolution.

Former president given high honor

By Doug Mellgren
Associated Press

OSLO, Norway (AP) – Jimmy Carter accepted the Nobel Peace Prize on Tuesday long-awaited for his diplomacy in the Middle East in the '70s – with a warning to nations to avoid bloodshed in resolving their conflicts.

With the world on edge over terrorism and a possible U.S.-led attack on Iraq, the former U.S. president told an audience at the Nobel ceremony that war only breeds more war.

"War may sometimes be a necessary evil," he said. "But no matter how necessary, it is always an evil, never a good. We will not learn to live together in peace by killing each other's children."

And while he did not mention President Bush by name, Carter cautioned against the use of war as a tool of policy.

"For powerful countries to adopt a principle of preventative war may well set an example that can have catastrophic consequences," he said.

Carter '78, accepted the award at a solemn ceremony with music and flowers at the Oslo City Hall.

He was honored for his pursuit of peace, health and human rights that began with the 1978 Camp David accords between Israel and Egypt that – but for a formality – would have won him the prize 24 years ago. He was nominated too late.

Carter's wife, Rosalynn, and their children and grandchildren were among the hundreds in the audience, as was Norwegian King Harald V.

Smiling broadly, Carter, wearing a dark suit and red tie with blue-and-white stripes, displayed the gold Nobel medal and diploma to sustained applause. The prize also includes $1 million cash.

"This year's laureate does the opposite of what his countryman, Mark Twain, once wrote about forgetting where you bury the peace pipe but not where the battle-ax is hurled. Carter never mislays the peace-pipe," Nobel official Gunnar Berge said.

Berge, chairman of the five-member Norwegian awards committee, caused a stir when he announced the prize in October and called it a "kick in the leg" to President Bush.

Carter, a Democrat, has repeatedly urged the Republican administration to continue working with the United Nations to ensure Iraq has no weapons of mass destruction, and to avoid unilateral military action.

"Global challenges must be met by an emphasis on peace in harmony with others, with strong alliances and international consensus," he said. He urged respect for the United Nations as an international forum for solving disputes.

In his anti-war appeal, Carter also cited the 1950 Nobel peace laureate, Ralph Bunche, also an American.

"To suggest that war can prevent war is a base play on words and a despicable form of warmongering. The objective of any who sincerely believe in peace clearly must be to exhaust every honorable recourse in the effort to save the peace," he said, citing Bunche's Nobel lecture. "The world has had ample evidence that war begets only conditions which beget further war."

Nearly 2,000 Norwegian children greeted Carter in a peace celebration outside city hall in the snow-covered Norwegian capital Tuesday night, thousands of Norwegians held a torch-light parade in Carter's honor, ahead of the traditional Nobel lecture.

A Nobel concert, featuring performers including Willie Nelson and Santana, is scheduled for Wednesday.

PAC encouraging UMass not to support oppression

By Eugene Tetlow
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Since its establishment in 2000, the Palestine Action Coalition (PAC) has continually called for the University of Massachusetts to "divest its holdings in Israeli businesses, American businesses that sell weapons to Israel, and American businesses that profit from Israel's oppression of Palestinians."

Jonathan Elsberg, an active member and speaker for the PAC, believes that "the main impediment to a peaceful resolution in the Middle East is Israel's failure to negotiate in good faith."

"The end of occupation, and respect of human rights for Palestinians will be mostly won by Palestinians themselves. However, people outside of Palestine can help a little bit," Elsberg said. "The best way we can provide this help is to call for an end to the support provided by the U.S. government and industry, to the Israeli occupation of Palestine."

Because of this, the PAC has called for the divestment of UMass from Israel. The PAC focuses on Western Massachusetts and is active in all of the five colleges. Around the country there are over 80 universities with similar campaigns. If the majority of these groups succeed in their targets of forcing divestment, it is believed that huge pressure will be applied upon the U.S. government to withdraw its support for Israel, and upon the Israeli government to enter constructive negotiations with Palestine.

Despite its struggle, the PAC has had no success in its attempts to force UMass to divest. This setback however has not disillusioned PAC or any of its supporters who see their campaign as long term. For the moment, Elsberg reveals that the PAC is focusing on "the small steps, such as educating students as to what is going on in the Middle East through the teachings of guest speakers, the handing out of literature, and the showing of documentary films."

Two weeks ago, at an event organized by the PAC, a joint presentation was put on with the International Solidarity Movement (ISM). At this assembly, ISM members Neta Golan and George Rishmawi praised the work of the PAC and called for more attention focused upon this issue.

The ISM also seeks an end to the conflict in the Middle East. One of the ways they have become involved is by organizing groups that help in Palestine. The presence of these groups brings attention to the Palestinian cause and also, in the words of Elsberg, "means that the Israeli military is less likely to use lethal force due to the presence of outsiders."

Elsberg emphasized that the PAC is not calling for the divestment from all Israeli businesses. Rather, it is "concentrating on those businesses that directly support or aid the occupation of Palestine." For now, this does not include smaller Israeli businesses, however, Elsberg has not ruled out a future when the boycott of all Israeli products will be called for.

In a bid to encourage UMass to divest from pro-occupation companies, the PAC has organized a petition for those in favor of divestment. It is hoped that this petition will force the University to look further into this issue.

The Student Alliance for Israel (SAFI) has organized a counter petition in favor of the continued investment of University money in companies that the PAC argues are contributing to the occupation of Palestine.

This counter petition is not without controversy. Elsberg claims that SAFI's petition contained "bogus comments about PAC's divestment petition." He also claims that the wording of the petition was changed when PAC challenged SAFI's petition but "the votes attained prior to this alteration were not discarded."

Despite this, PAC and SAFI have maintained a civil relationship at most times, with members of each group challenging each other's opinions at debates and lectures.

The PAC recently received long-awaited data from the University that shows exactly which companies UMass is investing in. The PAC is currently examining the list, and hopes to soon inform the University which businesses it objects to University money being invested. Once this is done, the PAC will be able to focus more heavily on individual targets and therefore have a clear idea of which companies the University should divest from.

For more information on PAC and its campaigns, or for the opportunity to sign the petition, log on to the PAC website at www.westmasspac.org.

law at UMass and the Harvard Graduate School of Education, is co-author of five books and author of more than 50 articles about law and education.

Pyle, an associate at the Boston law firm Hill & Barlow, has experienced a similar issue in his high school years. He and his brother were suspended from South Hadley High School for wearing T-shirts that according to administrators, contained provocative language.

Pyle and his brother filed a lawsuit against the school committee in 1995, a case that made it all the way to the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court. The court ruled that state law protects student expression as long as it does not cause disruption in the school.

Some students, according to the Daily Hampshire Gazette, say Karson is misunderstood.

Karson has been suspended by the administration three times, the latest in November. All three suspensions were quickly rescinded after concerns were raised by the American Civil Liberties Union of Western Massachusetts.

William C. Newman, Karson's attorney, said that the appropriate response is more speech, and more productive speech.

"Can a school prevent a student from publishing materials on its grounds?" a parent in the audience asked.

"The answer is clearly no," Pyle said. "A school is a free speech zone for students to express their opinion and it's a part of education."

Too late to recover

Law should step aside

After years of stories trickling across the headlines revealing priest sex scandals, atrocious acts of pedophilia and now a potentially bankrupt Boston archdiocese, Cardinal Bernard Law is in a tough spot.

Since day one of the sex scandals, the church and Law himself have taken a quiet approach. The revelations that The Boston Globe and other media outlets have presented to the public have shaken the foundation the church is built on: the followers.

Law forgot a major caveat of leading a group of believers. He is there to serve the people of the Archdiocese.

The Catholic followers who are looking to their priests for guidance are instead finding closed mouths and closed doors. Law has avoided any straightforward responses or resolution.

If he was looking to recover from the initial shock of the news, he should have practiced what he teaches and asked the Catholics and priests he leads for forgiveness. Admitting there is a problem is the clas sic first step to finding a solution.

Apparently Law never learned to take this first stride and is now caught in a position where he is seeking guidance from the Vatican before presenting a solution to his followers.

But they have already lost faith in their leader. According to a poll conducted by WBZ, 82 percent of 400 Catholics polled want the beleaguered cardinal to step down.

This is a shocking majority. Even when Law was surrounded by the most alarming news, that of priests engaging in sexual acts with boys, he had stronger support than he does now.

This last straw of bankruptcy seems to be too much for the faithful to take. It is one more strike at the faltering structure of the church. Beyond that, it calls into question the way the entrenched structure of the Roman Catholic Church has been handling itself over centuries of changing ideals.

While a staggering number of people are calling for Law to recuse himself from the role of diocesan leader, he serves at the discretion of the Pope and, according to Catholic belief, God.

There are no checks, no balances in the Catholic Church. The tradition-based practices of the church are not meshing in a country where responsibility and accountability are expected from our leaders.

We don't always get what we want, we don't even get this from our political leaders, but the church acts on a whole other level.

And we expect the church to empty its ashtrays on this other level. When it appears that its leaders are failing and there is a public outcry against them, it is time to clean out and rebuild.

What news will come from Rome is still unclear. Whether the pope, who Law is expected to meet with before the end of the week, has any advice is still uncertain. But one thing is clear – this church-appointed shepherd has lost his flock.

The end of independent radio

FRANCES CARR

As my celebrate mediocrity
All the boss upstairs wanna see
How much you'll pay for what you used to get for free –Tom Petty

These lyrics come from Tom Petty's recent release entitled "The Last DJ."

On Feb. 8, 1996, then-president Bill Clinton signed the Telecommunications Act into law. The law, combined with advances in technology and increased emphasis on ratings promoted by corporate greed, would change the face of radio broadcasting forever. It loosened restrictions of ownership in markets from four stations to eight and gross national ownership restrictions became limitless. Before, no one company could own more than forty stations nationwide.

In the six years since the bill slinked its way into law, 4,000 out of 10,000 commercial radio stations have changed hands. And as a result, many live, local DJs are being replaced by more cost efficient methods since all the "boss upstairs" care about is the bottom line.

One such way is broadcasting generic shows across the country and passing them off as local shows, inserting traffic and weather for each respective city. If one DJ in San Diego can do the job of one thousand DJs nationwide, what are big business' incentives to keep them around, besides hum. I don't know, perhaps, quality and the unique local flavor that prepackaged shows lack?

Another method of cutting costs is voice tracking. This process allows a DJ to prerecord their show in the studio and upload it onto computer, a great way to cut corners and save some green. The station is only paying talent for one hour instead of three or four of actual live airtime. Then during the show's slot, an underpaid board operator plays the voice tracks and the predetermined play lists, which feature songs chosen based upon research and top 40 lists.

Voice tracking boasts the elimination of surprises. But isn't a lot of the appeal of live radio those surprises? The pockets of dead air. The little mistakes and the DJs apologetic explanations. It grants the listener the comfort of knowing that the DJ is a flawed human too. But wait, DJs aren't necessarily human anymore, so strike that.

The vast majority of radio stations nationwide have been bought out by mega corporations like Clear Channel, which currently owns more than 1,200 radio stations across all 50 states and Washington, D.C. Its website boasts that they reach more than 110 million listeners each week, 34 percent of all people ages 18-49 in the U.S. daily, and that advertisers spend almost 20 percent of their radio advertising dollars with them alone.

In essence, this company and others like it are growing exponentially because we are all listening, thus encouraging the homogenization of the airwaves. Soon the only choice on your radio dial will be the interchangeable mix stations that refuse to play ads thing but Pink, No Doubt and Creed. I don't know about anyone else but if that's what the future of radio holds in store for me, I am going to take a sledgehammer to every radio in sight.

To an untrained ear their proposal sounds intriguing, even beneficial. "Clear Channel Radio's size allows it to leverage state-of-the-art technology and large-market on air talent to deliver premium programming to smaller towns. Hugely popular shows can be broadcast all over the country giving listeners the programming and diversity they crave no matter where they are."

> "I don't know about anyone else, but if that's what the future of radio holds in store for me, I am going to take a sledgehammer to every radio in sight."

They go on to conclude, "Result: Greater value for both advertisers and listeners." Glenn Siegel, advisor at WRLA says, Result: "Good for business, bad for culture, music and radio."

Well, You can't turn him into a company man,
And you can't turn him into a whore
And the boys upstairs just don't understand any more
Well, the top brass don't like him talking so much,
And he won't play what they say to play

And he don't wanna change what don't need to change –Tom Petty

Living in the valley we are spoiled rotten, we have the choice of tuning into independent stations that feature real live community voices with a personal stake in the local issues, playing music freely based upon personal and listener predilection. But here's the big question: How many of you actually listen to said stations? How many of you can, without looking, recall the frequency of WMUA, (the radio voice of UMass, for those of you who don't know) off the top of your head? 91.1 FM.

It is up to us, fellow conscientious college students. Tune in and support the underdogs who are desperately trying to stay afloat for your sake or suffer the genetic, mainstream consequences.

Today, our state's capital city only has three independent radio stations left! The only Boston stations that have been able to resist the temptation of selling out are WFNX 101.7 FM, which plays alternative rock; WCRB 102.5 FM, a classical music station, and WILD 1090 AM, an urban outlet.

If stations continue to give in, and listeners keep lapping up what is being spoon-fed to them, this will continue. The rich will get richer as jobs are cut and salaries are compressed. And ultimately stations will become more and more disconnected from the public that they are supposed to be serving.

Siegel told me how sad it is when kids come to him and say they want to work in radio. He has to tell them, "You're about thirty years late, buddy."

There goes the last DJ
Who plays what he wants to play
And says what he wants to say, hey hey hey
And there goes your freedom of choice.
There goes the last human voice
There goes the last DJ –Tom Petty

If not capitalism, then what?

DAVE BISSON

It seems to be the million-dollar question and it was the topic of two contrasting pieces in the November 2nd edition of the Collegian. We all depend on our visions of private ownership, private investment, and competition for our day-to-day survival. Understandably, it is difficult for us to imagine what the U.S. might look like with any other system in place.

Since capitalism is such a central part of our lives we should perform a quick check to see how well the system is working. But how should we define the criteria for assessment? Feel free to fill this answer in for yourself. In the spirit of an Op-Ed, I'll let you know what I think.

First, the American economic system should have the capacity to sustain a dignified standard of living for all of our residents. By dignified, I mean adequate shelter, clothing, nutrition, healthcare, and education. Second, our economic system should facilitate real democracy. By this, I imply a model of governance marked by high levels of citizen participation and elected officials who are accountable to the best interests of their constituencies.

Third, our economic system should operate in a way that is ecologically sustainable for generations to come.

Are these goals lofty? Of course. Can we achieve them? I think so, but I'll get to that in a minute. For now, consider them "criteria" for assessing the effectiveness of American capitalism and take a look at some related facts.

The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services website reports that 600,000 Americans go homeless every night. The U.S. Department of Agriculture found that only 89.3 percent of U.S. households were "food secure" throughout 2001. The U.S. Census Bureau found 14 percent of Americans had no health insurance in 2000. United States Secretary of Education Rod Paige is quoted on Teach for America's website: "Nearly 70 percent of inner-city and rural fourth graders cannot read at even a basic level." You get the idea: our current economic system isn't doing so hot in the "dignified standard of living" category.

Moving along to the democracy criterion, it is instructive to look at a well-known quote from the late U.S. Supreme Court Justice Louis Brandeis (1856-1941): "We can have democracy in this country, or we can have great wealth concentrated in the hands of a few. We cannot have both." What did Mr. Brandeis mean? The answer is complex, but I'll outline a few examples of how concentrated wealth can undermine democracy.

Money buys access to and control over media outlets, and this affects public perception and understanding of issues that are critical to the health of democracy. Money also buys access to public officials through professional lobbyists. Finally, money determines which candidates get their message to the public, and it buys political loyalty through huge campaign contributions. If all this wealth is extremely concentrated, democracies become plutocracies – governments by and for the wealthy.

Is wealth highly concentrated in the U.S.? Absolutely. The Federal Reserve's 1998 Survey of Consumer Finance shows a distribution of total net worth – assets minus debts – where the wealthiest 10 percent own 70.9 percent (the infamous "top one percent owns 38.1 percent), and the poorest 40 percent own two tenths of a percent. Furthermore, the concentration of wealth has been increasing at a phenomenal rate. In 1976, the top 10 percent owned 49%; (with the top 1% owning 19%). Again, you get the idea: our economic system is not facilitating real democracy.

The final criterion for evaluating the effectiveness of our economic system is ecological sustainability. In our current model of capitalism, publicly traded corporations must grow quickly, often at rates of 15 to 15 percent compounded annually, if they want to attract investors. The relation to ecology is that these rates of growth are completely unsustainable on a planet with finite resources. Consumers also play a role by consuming at unsustainable levels. But these levels of consumption are necessary to create the rates of corporate growth that investors desire, and to keep the economy from stalling out. We are standing on a "treadmill" of consumption and production that keeps speeding up.

I just painted a pretty dismal picture about the limitations of American capitalism. Maybe it's because I'm an economics major we're called "dismal scientists." But the funny thing is, I have more hope now about the economic future of this country and the world than I've ever had.

Which brings me back to the title. If not capitalism, then what? What is this solution that I'm leading you towards? The answer is E2M. It stands for "the economic model of the second millennium," also known as Community Conscious Capitalism. E2M is an organization that was founded in 2000 and is based here in the Pioneer Valley. Its mission is to empower entrepreneurs, employees, investors, institutions, and communities to create a model of capitalism that will co-exist with the current model while changing it gradually but fundamentally. The model does this by defining a quantifiable business standard of community consciousness that includes employees and the community as financial stakeholders.

E2M sees capitalism as a tool that concentrates wealth. While this tool has been used primarily by individuals and corporations in the traditional model, communities throughout the nation could establish E2M regional models and begin using capitalism to create enormous economic power in their own hands. Through this process, and by sharing resources with each other, they could acquire the financial assets needed to move our country and our world towards the ideals of democracy, ecological sustainability, and a dignified standard of living for all.

This spring, UMass will have a chance to contribute to and benefit from E2M in several ways. If we want our university to take a stand in pursuit of economic justice through a better economic model, a significant student movement will be essential to direct and support the decisions of student government, faculty, and the administration. E2M already enjoys significant and credible support both on campus and in the broader community, but our involvement will add a unique passion and energy. If you'd like to see our economic system of capitalism work more effectively for the common good, get excited, because the solution is here for the making.

Letter to the Editor:
SPIRE update

To the Editor:

The SPIRE system opened for Spring 2003 pre-registration at 9 a.m. on Thursday, November 14 and closed on Tuesday, December 3, 2002 at 5 p.m. when pre-registration ended. During that period, 89 percent (15,4351 of the undergraduate and 40 percent (1831) of the graduate students enrolled in one or more courses. This represents approximately 95,000 course seats that were filled by students using the SPIRE system. While registration was successful in facilitating student's enrollment in courses, we were interested in how students received the SPIRE system. OIT requested a Pulse survey of undergraduate students to capture student's reactions to SPIRE. The results show that SPIRE was favored by the majority of students with newer students strongly favoring the system and returning students perceiving SPIRE to be an improvement in service.

When asked to rate SPIRE overall, 46.4 percent of the students rated it as good or excellent and 58.5 percent rated it as fair with only 15 percent rating is as poor. When asked about SPIRE functions, 59.8 percent said they found the registration process somewhat to very easy, 63.5 percent found adding and dropping courses somewhat to very easy and fully 77 percent said they found class searching somewhat to very easy. Interestingly, first semester students found it easier than did their counterparts to use these SPIRE functions. For example, 71.1 percent of the former, but only 54.6 percent of the latter found the registration process to be very or somewhat easy. Also, 91.8 percent of first semester students, compared to just 70.1 percent of others, found it very or somewhat easy to do class searches. More than three-quarters (76.4 percent) of students in their first semester found it very or somewhat easy to add, or drop a class; only 57.7 percent of other students found this process very or somewhat easy.

Two-thirds (66.8 percent) of all students surveyed found the instructions on SPIRE to be somewhat to very helpful. However, students in their first semester were much more likely to find the instructions on the SPIRE website to be somewhat or very helpful: 82.1 percent of them, but only 60.9 percent of their counterparts found the instructions helpful. Finally, when asked about the SPIRE "interface," 59.4 percent of all students said they found it somewhat to very easy to navigate around the SPIRE website. On the other hand, nearly three-quarters (76.1 percent) of students in their first semester, compared to only half (51.9 percent) of other students, found it very or somewhat easy to figure out how to navigate around the SPIRE website.

Although first semester students favored SPIRE more than returning students, when asked to compare the SPIRE system to the old phone registration system, 63 percent of returning students said they somewhat to strongly preferred the SPIRE system. This result indicates that nearly two-thirds of returning students believe the SPIRE system to be an improvement in service.

OIT continues to make improvements in the SPIRE system. On November 25, one of the highest demand days during registration, 95 percent of all class searches occurred in less than 10 seconds. This was due to reconfiguration of hardware and software by OIT staff. An analysis of SPIRE online surveys provided general themes that are of concern to students. In the coming week OIT will conduct two focus group sessions with students to discuss these themes and further identify how the SPIRE system can be improved to better serve students.

Advice for female rock groups

THE DONNAS SEEM TO BE TRYING TO PUT OFF THE BRITNEY SPEARS INNOCENT-YET-SEXY ALSCHOOLGIRL TRICK – BUT IT'S NOT WORKING.

ROCK N' OUT
With Samara Marblestone

When you think of "rock 'n' roll," what pops into your head?

Personally, when I think of this genre of music, I think of controversy, heavy guitar riffs, toughness, rebelliousness, and other qualities that the average person would associate with "masculine" qualities.

So, tell me this. Why is it whenever there's an all-female rock band do they have to be extra feminine and sexual? In other words, they have to acquire (or pretend to acquire) exaggerated characteristics that the average person would associate with feminine qualities. Why can't they just be themselves? Do women have to exaggerate stereotypical female qualities in order to survive and make it in the rock biz?

Apparently The Donnas think so.

The Donnas, a new teenage punk rock group, consists of lead vocalist Brett Anderson ("Donna A."), guitarist Allison Robertson ("Donna R."), bassist Maya Ford ("Donna F."), and drummer Torry Castellano ("Donna C."). So their nicknames are all "Donna" – get it? So that's why they're called The Donnas.

Clever.

I bet you $100 that if an all-male rock group did this cheesy stunt, they would never make it and constantly be the butt of all jokes until something more lame rolled through in the world of rock 'n' roll.

Their hit album, Spend the Night, was released Oct. 22 by Atlantic Records. Their first single, "Take it Off," has been the best thing that has happened to MTV2. The Donnas are there, trying to be provocative in a really girly and obviously innocent way. Yet, at the same time they are trying to be really tough girls. Think the Spice Girls.

So yeah, I know sex sells – I'm not stupid. Everything that is associated with The Donnas is sexual. Just look at the name of its album and hit single. I'm not saying that there's something wrong with sexually tilted albums and songs, but that's all The Donnas are made up of it seems. They're trying to pull off the Britnes Spears innocent-yet-slutty schoolgirl trick ... but it's not working.

Let's take another look at this sorry situation – a male point of view. All-male rock groups don't have to be sexy to sell at all. In fact, I find the complete opposite works for them. Look at Kid Rock for example. He's anything but sexy, and he definitely knows it. Yet, so many of his female fans find him irresistible such as his fiancee, Pamela Anderson. In other words, Kid Rock is himself. I'm not quite sure if the same goes for The Donnas.

OK. I'm going to try to be a little nicer. Maybe it's not all The Donnas' fault. Look at past successful all-female music groups such as The Runaways, The Bangles, and The Go-Go's. The Donnas are following the same exact formula as them, but I think that it's time to grow up, modernize a bit, and move on. It's cool to be cute and sexy, but not to the point that makes your stomach upset. For example, why are they all nicknamed "Donna"? Was it just so they could have a cute name like, well, The Donnas?

So here's some advice for some potential chick rockers: be yourself, ok? The male rockers have and it proves to be very successful. The more you try to appeal to what you think everyone else's standards are will come as a slap in the face when you realize what you did when you turn 40 years old, are married and have 2.5 kids, and are embarrassed to see you and your hand on VH1's "Where Are They Now?" and how much you changed yourself for everyone else. And guess what – there's nothing you could do about it except wish that you didn't listen to everyone else.

'Sopranos' Pantoliano tells all in autobiography

By Jake D. Lewis
COLLEGIAN STAFF

WHO'S SORRY NOW?
Joe Pantoliano
Dutton Books

Joe Pantoliano is one of those actors who pops up in a bunch of movies, but a name who most people can't recall when they see the actor. Even after memorable roles in The Matrix and Memento to name just two, he's still one of Hollywood's most underrated actors.

With the publishing of his childhood memoir, Who's Sorry Now? Pantoliano may become a household name. Unlike the majority of other Hollywood actor – tell all's, Pantoliano doesn't spend much time talking about how he became an actor, but instead he talk about growing up, and this route feels much more effective than merely relating the bumps in the road to becoming a movie star. Most of the amusing anecdotes he tells about are set in Hoboken, New Jersey and told in street-wise, Italian-American lingo that feel like they came out of the mouth of his character Ralphie from "The Sopranos." (The title of the first chapter, "Kiss My Ass and Make It A Love Story," tests its case). Indeed, at some points, it can be hard to believe that these events aren't fictional, but Pantoliano keeps things humorous and fast-paced, making it a fun read even if he has taken some poetic license with his life.

The memoir also has a very sentimental side to it, mostly dealing with Pantoliano's strained relationship with his mother and father, and it can be quite touching at times. Pantoliano realizes, however, that part of the demographic that might be reading his book are men who prefer more action than drama, and early on, he includes an amusing disclaimer apologizing for any sappiness he may write within the pages.

Growing up in Hoboken, Joey "Pants" (as he is nicknamed) can't help but be influenced by the legacy of his hometown's biggest hero, Frank Sinatra. Joey's family harbors some resentment against Sinatra, mostly because Ol' Blue Eyes supposedly swindled Joey's dad, Monk, out of some money. A kindly, but somewhat pathetic man, Monk constantly takes the verbal abuse of his wife, and this argumentative lifestyle can't help but affect the boy. He turns inward, at first gaining weight possibly because he doesn't like himself, and then getting in with the bad crowd.

Constantly moving from home to home, and bouncing from school to school, Joey has a hard time identifying himself and finding his place. This is further illustrated when his mother informs him that Monk is not his father, an ex-convict named Florrie. Florrie has just been released from prison, and he comes to live with Joey and his mother, which results in Monk being kicked out.

As is evident, Joey's childhood was not a stable one. Yet for the duration of it, Pantoliano doesn't harbor any resentment. In fact, even though his mother is not described in a very admirable light, the reader can't help but like her for some reason – if nothing more than pity. Joey's "step-dad" Florrie (his mother and Monk never officially separated) is perhaps the most honest character as Pantoliano relates the man's sadness upon leaving "the life" and going straight. Despite the fact that he was a made man, we can't help but like him.

There are some situations I would've liked to read more about, and others I didn't need to know so much about. More of his breakthrough into Hollywood would have been intriguing, while a few of the childhood memories could have been whittled down to save time. Pantoliano never declares who he thought his "real" father was, and slightly nags at me, that he is so resigned about this leap his mother threw his way. However, the reader can gather from the outrageous temper of Pantoliano's mother, that this might have been something she said out of anger, with no real truth.

Yet the grandest purpose of Who's Sorry Now? (taken from the title of a Connie Francis song) is that it's Pantoliano's way of resolving the rocks relationship with his late mother. This book was written both as a catharsis for Pantoliano, but also a way for him to say that all the bad blood between them is forgiven. Who's Sorry Now? despite its tough-gu facade, is truly deep-down a love story for his mother, from a real stand-up guy.

JOEY PANTOLIANO'S MEMOIR, WHO'S SORRY NOW, SHOWS THE ACTOR'S TOUGH-GUY EXTERIOR HIDES A SOFT HEART.

Mann defies obstacles and releases personal LP

AIMEE MANN
Lost in Space
Superego Records

While the new album is titled Lost in Space, Aimee Mann's latest effort comes on the heels of a four-year winning streak that earned her an Oscar nomination and the start-up record label Superego Records. Mann is not only well known for her music, but also for her battles with the record industry.

The singer/songwriter finally shows her true artistry, no longer having record company executives compromise her work. But there are times when she gets pulled back in (she's currently settling a lawsuit against Universal Music Group for releasing an unauthorized greatest hits compilation).

Mann's career started after forming the 80s new wave band 'Til Tuesday. With its first and most recognizable hit, "Voices Carry," Mann experienced the stardom that comes from being a rock star, but the years that followed, pitted her against the corporate music executives at Epic Records who stopped at nothing to control her music and image.

The group disbanded at the end of the 80s, leaving Mann to start a solo career that would be both fruitful and rife with frustration. After a five-year hiatus Mann signed with the independent Imago releasing Whatever. Shortly the label collapsed and blocked Mann from leaving.

After hastily signing with Geffen Records, I'm With Stupid was released in 1995, and her single "That's Just What You Are" from the "Melrose Place" soundtrack generated more notoriety for the solo musician. Dealing with these large record companies suffocated her both artistically and commercially. These include controlling small details (like printing a booklet for a CD) to promoting her CDs, or her controlling her image.

In 1998 Mann was commissioned by director Paul Thomas Anderson (Boogie Nights, Punch Drunk Love) to create the soundtrack for his upcoming film Magnolia. Lowkey songs "Save Me" and "Wise up" got her an Oscar nomination and brought Mann back to the mainstream.

Geffen was eventually disbanded and Mann was reassigned to Interscope Records. This proved to be the last straw. After Interscope decided to withhold her previous album Bachelor No. 2 because of its "lack of commercial viability." Mann wised up, decided to pack up and left to start her own label. Buying back the master tapes from Interscope Records with the royalties from the Magnolia soundtrack.

Production values and the artwork on the CD and booklet are better than in her previous stints, the artwork on the CD and booklet. She's also doing something else that record labels dare not: placing all the album's songs (uncut) online using streaming technology (www.aimeemann.com).

The record is darker than her usual fare. Instead of singing about her dealings with the record companies, she goes off on a different note as it deals with themes of addiction and disconnection. Though this is a departure from singing about relationships, her lyrics speak of addiction in terms of obsession and moodiness speak very clearly in the song "This is How It Goes." "Cause it's all about drugs, it's all about shame ... So I'll try to hold on, while you try to let go."

She does get into a few cliches, such as in the song "Humpty Dumpty" ("All the king's horses and all the king's men couldn't put baby back together again"), or "The Moth" ("The moth don't care when he sees the flame, he might get burned). She also recycles some of her sound ("Guys Like Me" sounds similar to "Save Me"). But these details are small, compared to the way the songs work.

Despite the depressing content of her lyrics, she still manages to instill a sense of hope through using upbeat music. "Pavlov's Bell," a song about a dysfunctional relationship, is the most enjoyable with its soaring chorus and razor sharp guitar riffs.

The album will likely be appealing to newcomers as well. Her silky, delicate voice is unforgettable, lending itself perfectly to her melodies. It sounds more pop than her usual folksy songs and yet it maintains a level of craft and thought that makes Lost in Space a compelling step up.

AIMEE MANN PLAYFULLY POSES WITH A NUMBER OF RECORD LABELS BEFORE FINALLY LANDING SAFELY ON SUPEREGO RECORDS AND RELEASING AN INDIVIDUAL ARTISTS' ALBUM.

Mineola offers comedic wit with alter ego charcters

By Brian Castro
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In the present era of modern plays and musicals most producers take the safe route when choosing their material. After all, who doesn't want to see a safe and funny comedy like The Producers for example? However, once in a while an odd gem comes along where you say to yourself at the end, what the heck did I just see?

With 40 costume changes, 20 bad wigs and two good actors The Mineola Twins is an all out camp fest. It's one of those nice occasional gems that manages to entertain and take on thought provoking issues without batting an eyelash. It pushes envelopes with its uncompromising view on the social divide that came about in America in the early 60s to date in most every aspect. What other play around does the bombing of an abortion clinic and make the audience laugh about happening?

Paula Vogel, the controversial back seat driver of the playwriting world and creator of The Mineola Twins, knows how to ruffle opinions. She is known for going down both sides of the fence when writing and by her lifestyle. Communists, who happen to be openly homosexual. Despite the criticism her detractors have also garnered a Pulitzer Prize, How I Learned to Drive, and an Obie Award for Best Play (The Baltimore Waltz).

As Vogel dangles her productions, there's two ways to do this play, one with good taste or bad taste but sings. Personally I prefer the second way.

The Mineola Twins is a satire on the changing political landscape and accomplishments of women's role in society, before World War II taking place over the time span of three political decades – the Eisenhower, Kennedy and Bush administrations. The play follows the lives of polar opposite twins – Myrna (the good twin) and Myra (the bad twin) – sarcastically through the trauma pains of high school and the following decade of opposing ideologies that separates them interestingly enough besides having a difference in views the other distinguishing factor that separates the two of them is Myra's larger bust size.

The play takes place in the town of Mineola, a small Anytown, USA of the late 50s during the Eisenhower administration.

There are several dream sequences but the wildly exaggerated [illegible] and drug [illegible]. The funniest scene shows Myra in a sleepy dance number accompanied by zombies that pokes fun at the nuclear attack drills of the early Cold War. As Myra says, "I knew it would be Bill's squat target under the desk."

From there we go on the radical ride. After a year of taking shock therapy in an insane asylum Myra is an inhibited and uptight housewife who suffers from heart pain and the residual effects of her treatment. Myra is a free spirited radical on the run after robbing a bank. Making the final stop in the 80s Myra is a deadpan imitation of Rush Limbaugh, only her wide conservative radio show and Myra is a lesbian working at Planned Parenthood.

Stitched The Mineola Twins is very tongue in cheek. There are several references to many aspects of the culture during the time period and the dialogues is clever and witty. When Educating Fannie's Dan Flushing critic's seem to be not offering positive portrayals of women I have to laugh – cackle – Myrna.

The acting is over the top. Anne McDonnell plays both twins tremendously, especially her dark portrayal of Myrna. Sean Eagles is also noteworthy playing the confused sons.

There's an excellent quality in the production, with moving sets and overly exaggerated costumes. For those who plan to go, take note that real cigarette smoke is used in the smoking scenes. The play uses sound effects and music staples from the era like "White Rabbit" from Jefferson Airplane and Cyndi Lauper's "She Bop."

Dance sequences offer interludes to transition the stories and to alter the numerous set and costume changes between scenes. During one dance break in one of the 80s scenes the two dancers are dressed as pregnant outfits doing the robot dance.

In addition to the physical humor, there is plenty of up-front sexual innuendo. Vogel also instructs in her script that "all the characters about should be played in a constant state of high hormonal excitement." While there isn't any thing explicit, both of the lead-lock lips on a few scenes and the dancers engage in some risque dance sequences.

For those who couldn't catch last week's performances the play will run for a few more dates from Dec. 11 through Dec. 14 at the Fine Arts Center in the Rand Theater at 8 pm.

place. All we had to do was get the second line to show a little more and get more active," Calhoun said. "No question the press turned the game around for us. We changed the pace of the game."

UMass used a very deliberate offense to frustrate UConn and hold it to a season-low nine first half points, while chipping in an opportunistic 30.

"I think in the first half we were comatose," Calhoun said. "We became discouraged by the fact that we couldn't run and we were having to play defense for so long."

The crowd of 14,962 stayed from its lashing of former Husky Marcus Cox to let the home team know how it felt after a dismal first half performance.

"It might be ridiculous to the new players," Gordon said. "But I faced it last year against [St. Bonaventure]. You just don't expect, going into the game, to hear something like that."

Senior forwards Micah Brand and Jackie Rogers combined for 18 in the half while Texan shot blocker Emeka Okafor was on the bench with three fouls.

But Okafor's second half return – he played all 20 minutes – held Rogers and Brand to just seven more points while limiting the opportunities of the UMass press-break.

The sophomore had only four points after averaging over 19 for the first five games, but still blocked five shots while altering numerous more.

Still, even with the run, UMass found itself down just two with under four minutes remaining.

"When you're down two with 3:12 to go but you've surrendered a big lead, it's a lot different than being down two with 3:12 to go and going back and forth the whole game," Lappas said.

The Minutemen partially regained their shooting touch when six straight points by Marcus Cox brought the score to 46-44 with 2:33 left, but the Huskies were too much down the stretch.

Gordon answered Cox's flurry with his third three of the game, and UConn hit 10-of-12 free throws in the final two minutes to seal the game. Gordon led all scorers with 18 points, including 16 in the second half.

Anthony Anderson found his shooting touch to lead UMass with 15 points after two straight games out of double figures.

who Lafreniere believes lost a full second in the 55-meter hurdles. Jackson was given a 9.2 and fourth place, while Lafreniere believed she earned an 8.2 and second.

"It didn't effect the outcome of the meet but it would have qualified her for the New England Championships... it was a little discouraging," Lafreniere said.

The Maroon and White also sent three competitors to Bates College in Maine for a pentathlon. Therien Crystal came in first overall, putting yet another Minutewoman into the New England Championships. Also very impressive at Bates was freshman Ashley Creel, who came in second and qualified for the pentathlon and the high jump, scoring a personal best at Bates.

Lafreniere knows that this positive beginning is due to fall training coach Antoinette Carrol, who worked with the women while Lafreniere worked with the cross-country team.

"She worked our butts off," said senior captain Jennifer Freeman.

Freemas was convinced that Carrol is the most qualified of fall coaches that the Maroon and White have worked with in her time at UMass.

The victory was well earned, with a preseason full of intensive training. The Minutewomen have a long break before their next competition on Jan. 18.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You must be tender, generous, and understanding with those who trust you to show them the way today.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You must be willing to look at a difficult issue from more than one perspective today. The unfamiliar may be most beneficial to you.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You will not be able to ignore your own creative impulses today, but you mustn't neglect your own practical responsibilities.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – It's time you shared that secret with someone close to you. He or she is certain to understand, and can offer you a valid new perspective.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Someone may accuse you today of asking the wrong choice, but the jury is still out. In time, you're sure to be vindicated.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Something you've not been aware of may become so influential to you that you are unable to ignore it any longer.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Take your cue from someone else who has been in your shoes recently. Be sure you don't shrink from a hidden challenge when it is revealed.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You may be able to have exactly what you want by day's end, but you will have to work hard to hang on to it for any length of time.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may be unusually stubborn for no apparent reason. Take care that you don't let your mood become aggressive or abusive.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Your insecurities may be rising to the surface once again today.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You are likely to be quite adventurous throughout the day, but you may balk at an opportunity a rival offers you after dark.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You may have to make even routine things crystal clear to others today, as communication may be quite difficult.

UConn ends on 50-14 run

HARTFORD, Conn. – From the sound of it, Connecticut had the game won when a Rashad Anderson three-pointer made the score 36-19. At that point the nearly-all UConn crowd went ballistic, came to their feet and remained a part of the game for the next 15:48.

It was the crowd that seemed to bring the Huskies back from a 34-9 deficit to a 59-48 win over the Massachusetts men's basketball team last night at the Hartford Civic Center.

The momentum of the game, the crowd, it [all] fed itself," said UConn coach Jim Calhoun after his team scored more points in the second half than UMass did in 40 minutes of action.

Tasked to play a full court press after halftime, the Blue and White surrounding the court grew louder and harder as Calhoun's squad forced turnovers after turnover and sank two after two.

It was then that the shooting. It was the way we changed the pace of the game," said Calhoun, whose team shot 8-of-12 from downtown in the second half. UConn missed all seven of its attempted threes in the first.

After converting just five turnovers into one three-pointer in the first half, the Huskies erased the big Minuteman lead with 18 points off 12 forced turnovers in the second frame.

Following Anderson's trifecta, UConn point guard Taliek Brown stole the ball from freshman guard Mike Epstein and hit backcourt mate Ben Gordon, who drilled a three. His own Brown found Gordon again for a minute later for another two, to cut the lead to 36-25.

From that point, the Husky faithful was the sixth man on the floor, causing more UMass turnovers and bad decisions than the UConn players themselves.

Maroon and White point guard Anthony Anderson turned the ball over on the next possession and Brown found freshman forward Denham Brown, who hit another from downtown cutting the lead to 36-28. The crowd roared its approval. With the Civic Center rocking and rolling and the media straining to hear an announcement from the public announcer, it was impossible to tell that the hometown crowd was taking it to a 14-team by eight points.

Vladoe Rogers turnover and subsequent Denham Brown trey cut the lead to 36-31, sending the crowd into an even greater frenzy. The UConn pressure caused a 10-second violation on UMass' possession, and Rashad Anderson sank another one from behind. Then, off another steal from Taliek Brown.

Gordon stole a Micah Brand pass and drew a foul from the 6-foot-11 UMass captain on the fast break. He sank both shots and tied up the game, but the final 7:54 were moot, as all of the momentum and confidence had completely shifted to the Huskies.

A 13-foot jumper by senior forward Mike Hayes gave the Huskies their first lead of the game and capped off a 22-0 run. UMass committed six of its sec

Iraqi declaration under fire

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – [illegible] on an accelerated timetable [illegible] in accordance with the U.N. Security Council's declaration that Iraq has failed to disarm itself of weapons of mass destruction, President Bush has threatened war if Saddam does not disarm any programs or existing weapons of mass destruction.

The document also could provide important information on companies and countries that provided weapons technology and hardware to Iraq, potentially embarrassing some U.S. allies.

President Bush will be briefed on what is contained in the declaration but the inquiry is "still in very preliminary stages," the spokesman said.

Secretary of State Colin Powell will be briefed, as well.

The document was copied and broken up to be evaluated in sections by specialists gathered according to their areas of expertise.

Most of the work was being done at the CIA headquarters in Langley, Va., but some evaluation was under way elsewhere in the Washington area, officials said.

The 10 other members of the Security Council will be given their copies next week after Blix and other U.N. officials remove some of the sensitive material, a U.S. official said Tuesday on condition of anonymity.

Syria objected strenuously to the arrangement, insisting it should have access to the original declaration, including sensitive information.

Powell denounced Saddam, asserting in a French television interview, "He's a liar.

"We'll see now whether he decides that the cost of lying is too great. The cost of lying now might result in his regime being destroyed by the armed forces of the international community," he said during a Dec. 5 interview with France 2, a state-run station. The State Department released the transcript Tuesday.

Classes cancelled?

The University of Massachusetts cancelled all night classes last night as a winter weather storm system threatened western Massachusetts with a combination of rain, sleet, freezing rain and snow.

The National Weather Service (NWS) expected snow to develop across northwest Massachusetts into New Hampshire last night. A winter weather warning was issued for Franklin Hampshire and the northern Worcester counties of Massachusetts and two counties in New Hampshire.

NWS reported that snow could become heavy overnight with snow accumulation ranging from four to eight inches. Overall, NWS expected five to ten inches of accumulation locally.

The winter weather system, which stretched from Ohio to Washington D.C. yesterday morning, created roads with bare pavement in Washington D.C. were closed or opened late. NWS reported that all planes at Dulles Airport outside of Washington were grounded.

Ohio also found themselves under heavy winter weather advisories and warnings this morning as the system pushed through.

Areas around Albany, New York also were issued a severe weather advisory. NWS reported that rain turned over to snow last night more quickly than expected and said it was possible that snow could fall there at the rate of an inch or two an hour. Five to 10 inches of snow were also expected there.

Yemen to cease missile purchases

By Pauline Jelinek
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – Ending an embarrassing faceoff with Yemen, Bush administration officials said Wednesday they secured an agreement from the Arab nation to no longer buy Scud missiles from North Korea.

But the understanding was not reached until after the United States was forced to release to Yemen a vessel containing North Korean-made missiles.

"We have no choice but to obey international law," White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said. "What Yemen has done ... does not provide a threat to the United States. We do have ongoing concerns about North Korea's efforts to sell arms around the world."

Fleischer said the Bush administration will use the incident to strengthen treaties and international agreements dealing with the proliferation of missiles. Bush ordered his nonproliferation experts to begin working on ways to close gaps in international laws that already curb nuclear, biological and chemical sales, administration officials said.

Forces from the amphibious assault ship USS Nassau had been aboard the detained vessel since Tuesday awaiting orders on what to do with it and the weapons, Pentagon officials said.

The incident underscored the challenges Bush faces in the war on terrorism, when the lines dividing allies from potential enemies are often blurred. Yemen is a haven for terrorists, including Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida network, but the government has pledged to help Bush fight terrorism in the Middle East.

Two senior administration officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Yemen had recently agreed in principle to stop buying missiles from North Korea but that the agreement had not taken effect before the incident.

On the missiles the U.S. released Wednesday, Fleischer said Yemen promised not to turn them over to anybody else.

Fleischer said U.S. intelligence had identified the ship and its cargo from early on in its voyage, and knew it was headed somewhere in the Middle East. He said the U.S. feared a rogue nation might be the destination; officials said privately Iraq was a possibility.

"Yemen is an ally of the United States, in that sense it does not provide a threat to the United States," Fleischer said.

"Yemen is doing everything it can to help us on the war on terrorism," the spokesman said.

Still, it was clear U.S. officials were disappointed in Yemen's actions. Fleischer was asked why the vessel flew no national flag and why the missiles were hidden aboard the ship. He tersely referred the last question to Yemen.

There was disagreement inside the administration over whether Yemen had broken its word.

Defense officials said the shipment – 15 missiles as well as missile parts and fuel – violated an agreement Yemen made with the United States not to buy such equipment from North Korea, which Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld has called the world's worst missile proliferator. Other officials, including a consensus inside the White House, said Yemen did not violate the agreement.

A Yemeni official told The AP in Sana that Foreign Minister Abu Bakr al-Kerbi summoned U.S. Ambassador Edmund J. Hull to protest the seizure and ask for the return of the equipment, which was for "defensive purposes."

Intelligence officials had tracked the vessel for weeks and the Spanish military stopped it Monday as it sailed 600 miles off the Horn of Africa, without a flag designating its country of origin. The weapons were hidden under a cargo of cement and crew members initially lied about their identity, saying they were Cambodian, officials said.

The decision to release the missiles came after discussions with Yemeni officials by Secretary of State Colin Powell and Vice President Dick Cheney, Fleischer said.

"We have looked at this matter thoroughly. There is no provision under international law prohibiting Yemen from accepting delivery of missiles from North Korea. While there is authority to stop and search, in this instance there is no clear authority to seize the shipment of Scud missiles from North Korea to Yemen and therefore the merchant vessel is being released," Fleischer said.

Bush chooses Commission head

By Marcy Gordon
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – William H. Donaldson, the Wall Street veteran chosen by President Bush to head the Securities and Exchange Commission, faces the mission of restoring investor confidence shaken by financial scandals and leading an agency in disarray.

Bush, introducing the 71-year-old investment banker to reporters on Tuesday, said restoring Americans' faith in the markets and corporate integrity was essential to the nation's economic well-being.

Donaldson's charge, the president said, would be "to vigorously enforce our nation's laws against corporate corruption and to uphold the highest standards of integrity in the securities markets."

Donaldson, who has ties to Wall Street and the Bush family, noted the numerous cases of corporate wrongdoing over the past year and promised to deal with them swiftly.

"It's time for all of us to pull up our socks," he said.

Donaldson's nomination was met with generally approving reactions Tuesday, and his confirmation by the Senate appeared assured.

Reforms and the policing of corporate America were thrown into turmoil at a critical time for public confidence with the resignations under fire last month of SEC Chairman Harvey Pitt and William Webster, a former FBI and CIA director who had been named to head a new board overseeing the accounting industry.

Pitt and Webster both quit amid the furor over the SEC's selection of Webster to head the oversight board. So did Robert Herdman, the agency's chief accountant, whose role in Webster's appointment is being investigated along with Pitt's.

Their departures came just when the SEC is investigating and prosecuting the accounting scandals at big companies like Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and Global Crossing Ltd., which wiped out investors' retirement savings, cost tens of thousands of jobs and socked pension funds across the country.

"In recent months the SEC has been rudderless, raising the danger that for the first time since 1933 the markets will fragment as different states seek their own regulations," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., a member of the Senate Banking Committee. "Hopefully, Bill Donaldson is the right antidote."

The watchdog agency was created during the Depression in 1934 in response to the stock market crash of October 1929.

Donaldson, Schumer said, possesses "a rock-ribbed integrity."

Donaldson was chairman of the New York Stock Exchange from 1990-95 and a co-founder of Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette, a well-known investment banking firms.

Democrats and experts appeared to be keeping an open mind Tuesday on the question of whether a Wall Street figure should be named to police investment firms and corporate America.

Senate Banking Committee Chairman Paul Sarbanes, D-Md., who will lose that position next month when the Republicans regain control of the Senate, said he looked forward to "a thorough confirmation process in which Mr. Donaldson's record will be carefully examined and his views on the challenges facing the SEC fully reviewed."

Donaldson's Wall Street background is potentially helpful, suggested Georgetown University securities law professor Donald Langevoort, a former special counsel at the SEC. "The question is, is he going to distance himself from it?" Langevoort said. "Otherwise, he's going to be tarred with the insider label."

Rep. Michael Oxley, R-Ohio, chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, said Donaldson's Wall Street background was among the things that made him a "first-rate choice for SEC chairman."

The oversight board, with subpoena authority and the power to discipline accountants, was created by Congress last summer in a law designed to prevent future corporate debacles. It has started its work without a permanent head and under a cloud, and the SEC chairman and four commissioners – two Republicans and two Democrats – must name a new chairman.

The SEC also is in the process of putting into effect new rules under the far-reaching law to fight corporate fraud and make companies and auditors more accountable.

Amid uncertain markets and a shaky economy, Bush is moving to revamp his economic team in advance of the 2004 election campaign. On Monday, he named railroad executive John Snow to succeed Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill. Still to be named is a replacement for White House economic chief Larry Lindsey, who, like O'Neill, was forced out.

Wall Street investment banker Stephen Friedman was said to be the leading candidate, but a final decision by Bush was awaiting the resolution of unspecified personal and professional issues that recently cropped up for Friedman.

Bush also was promising a new tax-cut package, which aides say could cost as much as $300 billion over 10 years, as the White House tries to control political damage from the ailing economy.

Democrats have criticized Bush's economic team as well as his policies, and had called for Pitt's resignation.

PRESIDENT BUSH, RIGHT, ANNOUNCES YESTERDAY THAT HE HAS CHOSEN INVESTMENT BANKER WILLIAM H. DONALDSON, LEFT, TO HEAD THE SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION. DONALDSON IS REPLACING HARVEY PITT, WHO RESIGNED UNDER PRESSURE AMID A SPATE OF CORPORATION ANDALS

On the horizon

Bush warns of Nukes

In case you haven't seen the memo, the Bush administration issued a reminder on Wednesday, morning reminding the world of its stringent policy regarding weapons of mass destruction used against the United States, namely that, if the tough rearly gets going, the gung will get tough – and armed, perhaps, with nuclear weapons.

"The United States will continue to make clear that it reserves the right to respond with overwhelming force – including through resort to all of our options – to the use of WMD [Weapons of Mass Destruction] against the United States, our forces abroad, and friends and allies," reads the statement in part.

Though the policy is far from new, it is the first time the strategy has been formally presented as an authorized means of combating enemy attack and broad brush.

The need for prevention efforts is obvious. The prospects for war with Iraq, which carry additional concerns of a direct chemical and/or biological attack on the U.S., demand a realistic response were the situation to arise. Trumping nuclear weapons as a potential retaliatory tool – however necessary the Bush administration considers it – is quite a step to take into public, placing a hypothetical yet devastating end to a situation for which even the beginning is still being derived and understood.

The motivations of senior officials seem appropriate in intent – pro-war or pro-peace, the underlying reality is that the U.S. does need to be adequately prepared to establish a competent system of self-defense. No matter the intentions of our own government, we cannot in good faith rely on other countries to lay still and react with non-violent measures forever. However, publicly hinging our own actions on nuclear capabilities is perhaps drawing too strong a conclusion to a conflict that has yet to reveal all of its pieces.

"It's the first time you're seeing a complex strategy to deal with a complex threat," said a senior official. "What we are talking about now is a different kind of deterrence, we're not deterring a single enemy."

It's also a complex public relations situation stemming from a different kind of administration – one that shouts without saying much. This time, however, it's a sure-fire attention getter, and they've got it.

While the administration forges ahead, sowing to protect regions of "vital interest," we hope that they keep in mind the area whose interests are most vital: here at home in the U.S.

Before Bush again goes to warn of an end that could be marked by nuclear warfare, he must first define the role the U.S. will play in its engagements with Iraq. With little perspective over that first horizon, it's difficult to imagine how he could see any further than that.

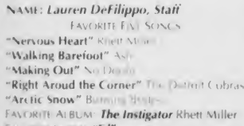
Ambiguity and a 'Lott' of racism

Last week, Senate Majority leader Trent Lott (R-MS) made a public apology for what was claimed to be ambiguous remarks to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). He was celebrating the 100th birthday of retiring Senator Strom Thurmond (R-SC), when he made the comment, "I want to say this about the state of Mississippi: We're proud of it. And if the rest of the country had followed our lead, we wouldn't have had all these problems over the years either."

Lott was suggesting that when Thurmond had run for the presidency in 1948, he was for segregation, and that the state of Mississippi had supported him. Lott said that if Thurmond would have been elected president, we wouldn't have had all these problems we've had since.

Lott has apologized for the statement, saying that he "deeply regrets" the comment and that the NAACP learned that Lott's comment was misinterpreted. Lott's comment was misinterpreted from the beginning. Lott has been a member of the NAACP since he was a student at Ole Miss, and has a 100 percent voting record with the NAACP, according to Senate Republican Policy Committee records.



However, the NAACP's reaction to Lott's comment was justified. Lott's comment was at the height of his power. Republicans control the Senate, the House of Representatives and the presidency. Lott is the Senate Majority Leader. He is the second highest ranking member of the federal government's executive branch

Wrestling superstar The Rock certainly has impressive pectoral muscles, but did anyone think that the clanking The Scorpion King was a good idea? Murder by Numbers was suspense by numbers. From a critical standpoint Jason X was awful, but I had so much fun watching it that I couldn't care less. My Big Fat Greek Wedding was a big fat hit, and a cliched one at that. As for Life, or Something Like It? Well, if life went like it, the audience could have been spared such dispiriting pap.

Last year's summer began badly and continued on that route, so when Spider-Man turned out to be such a graceful feat it held my hopes up. And, for the most part, so did the rest of May. There were the usual dregs (Deuces Wild, Woody Allen's Hollywood Ending and Enough, the Ho starring stinker that turned the real life horror of domestic abuse into a tired woman-in-peril thriller) and the disappointing big budget vehicles (the tinny new Star Wars and The Sum of All Fears). But there was plenty to like: the charming romance About a Boy, featuring Hugh Grant's best ever performance; the surprisingly sly and funny Undercover Brother; the animated horse opera Spirit: Stallion of the Cimarron; the silky erotic drama Unfaithful; and the tense suspense yarn Insomnia, featuring top notch Al Pacino and Robin Williams performances.

Then June came – and so did July and August. There were still a couple of truly excellent big studio releases (Steven Spielberg's awe-inspiring dystopian sci-fi thriller Minority Report and M. Night Shyamalan's Signs) and a few damn good ones (The Bourne Identity, Blood Work, Blue Crush.) Mostly though it was all crap: Bad Company, greasily directed by Joel Schumacher was the least fun action movie Jerry Bruckheimer ever produced.

Divine Secrets of the Ya-Ya Sisterhood is a false woman's pic that belongs more on Lifetime. Scooby-Doo was a witless rehash (Scooby-Doo, where were you?). Like Mike and Jawanna Mann scored airballs, and anyone who thought that The Crocodile Hunter: Collision Course was going to be a good movie deserved to be ripped off. Will Smith and Tommy Lee Jones reteamed for a hefty paycheck in Men in Black 2, which may be the first movie made entirely from Styrofoam. K-19: The Widowmaker was a decent, but rusty submarine adventure that only just stayed afloat.

"WHICH BRINGS US TO DECEMBER... GEEKS CAN REJOICE AS NEW STAR TREK AND LORD OF THE RINGS MOVIES ARE SET FOR RELEASE."

Adam Sandler tried to do Frank Capra, but the result was the wheezy Mr. Deeds. Speaking of wheezy, Austin Powers in Goldmember proved that the Powers franchise was running out of mojo. Eight-Legged Freaks was a good-natured throwback to those old '50s giant-bug movies, but just how bad were Halloween: Resurrection, Reign of Fire and Feardotcom? Scary pics couldn't get much worse. But truly scary was the singing animatronic bears of Disney's horrid The Country Bears. Consider yourself warned.

The snappy Lilo and Stitch charmed, as did Stuart Little 2, but kiddie movies were mostly represented by garbage like The Master of Disguise. That wasn't the only swill this past summer: XXX was The Fast and the Furious minus the fun. The workmanlike Serving Sara sunk, and so did the useless satire Simone (Al Pacino, you should be ashamed!).

Spy Kids 2: The Island of Lost Dreams offered nothing more than a retread of the original film. And Eddie Murphy should pay penance for making the atrocity known as The Adventures of Pluto Nash, a movie that cost $100 million dollars to make and grossed $4 million at the box office. The indies offered just as mixed a bag, from the inept (Pumpkin) to the ineffectual (The Importance of Being Earnest, The Good Girl and Possession) to the flawed but worthy (The Dangerous Lives of Alter Boys and Read My Lips.)

Fall kicked off with a whimper with the limp teen thriller Swimfan and the solid, if not entirely successful, cop drama City By The Sea. Canada should atone for sicking Tom Green on us, but at least Stealing Harvard wasn't half as bad as Freddy Got Fingered. Ballistic: Ecks vs. Sever sucked. The Tuxedo sucked, The Banger Sisters surprisingly didn't. Robin Williams was riveting in the chilling One Hour Photo.

Good actors got stuck in plenty of cardboard duds: Kevin Bacon and Charlize Theron in the wooden kidnap yarn Trapped, Heath Ledger in The Four Feathers (yay – British imperialism! Oy, vey.) and Reese Witherspoon and Josh Lucas in the painstakingly formulaic Sweet Home Alabama. At least Barbershop turned out to be heartfelt and funny.

There were plenty of horrors in October, most of them emanating from Jackass: The Movie. Actually Johnny Knoxville and his gang of pleasure seekers entertained; the same can't be said for the annoying jerks at the center of the nihilistic and shallow The Rules of Attraction (though, it must be said, James Van Der Beek did a very good job as a predatory college drug dealer.)

Red Dragon returned Hannibal "the Cannibal" Lecter to his Silence of the Lambs glory, but Glitter Slip (crappo) and The Ring (elegant, well-made and empty) failed to elicit scares. White Oleander was yet another fake, belongs-on-Lifetime chick flick (not so soon after Divine Secrets, please!) I enjoyed Jonathan Demme's French truffle The Truth About Charlie, I was mostly bored by the calendar art-looking Tuck Everlasting (though Gilmore Girl Alexis Bledel gives a luminous performance), and I thought The Transporter was brawny fun, but Formula 51 didn't give me a decent high. Abandon was smarter than I had any right to expect the teen suspenser to be, and so was the long delayed Knockaround Guys.

Adam Sandler gives a tender performance in Paul Thomas Anderson's bizarre, terrific – if a bit overrated – Punch Drunk Love. Madonna earned more critical boos for Swept Away; I'm thankful that it never opened around here. Autofocus, about the troubling sex addiction that plagued "Hogan's Heroes" star Bob Crane (impeccably incarnated by Greg Kinnear) may be one of the year's best films.

Did anyone think that it was a good idea to remake the TV series "I Spy"? Well, the movie I Spy is another notch in Eddie Murphy's belt of misguided career moves. Disney tormented the holidays with a pair of howlers: The Santa Clause 2, which was all wrapping and no present, and Treasure Planet, a dull, needless animated version of Robert Louis Stevenson's "Treasure Island." A lot of nice animation went in TP, too bad the filmmakers couldn't have added a script someone would give a damn about. Harry Potter and the Chamber of Secrets was slightly better than the original, and more transporting than Disney's Thanksgiving flop.

More inane action came in the forms of Half Past Dead (Steven Seagal and Ja Rule? Well, hell just froze over) and the direct-to-video ready Extreme Ops. The 20th James Bond adventure, the coolly slick Die Another Day was the year's best action movie, and the best Brosnan Bond. Friday After Next and 8 Crazy Nights are forgettable, not really all that humorous, holiday duds. They was a creepy, B-movie, while The Emperor's Club failed to make the grade. Solaris was daring to embrace than like. Making the holidays all the more ravishing was Todd Haynes' Far from Heaven, featuring a triumphant trio of performances from Julianne Moore, Dennis Quaid and Dennis Haysbert. And the great white rapper silenced his critics with a nuanced acting turn in the electrifying street drama 8 Mile.

Which brings us to December. Robert De Niro and Billy Crystal should go into psychotherapy for agreeing to reteam for Analyze That, but there's more to come. Geeks can rejoice as new Star Trek and Lord of the Rings movies are set for release. There are new romances (Maid in Manhattan, Two Weeks Notice), comedies (The Hot Chick, Drumline) and family films (The Wild Thornberrys Movie, Pinocchio) to taste, along with Oscar contenders plenty. Major directors are in the pipeline (Martin Scorsese, Steven Spielberg, Alexander Payne, Spike Lee(x)) to release films, and at least three superstars are jumping behind the camera: Denzel Washington (Antwone Fisher), George Clooney (Confessions of a Dangerous Mind) and Nicolas Cage (Sonny.)

Choosing the top 10 albums of 2002

Along with all of the essential DFA 12 inch singles listed in the adjacent article, here are my top 10 choices for 2002. And hey, I haven't heard everything. So if I missed your favorite, it doesn't necessarily mean it's bad. Unless it's Avril Lavigne.

TIM'S TOP 10 OF 2002

LIARS- They Stuck Us in a Trench and Put a Monument on Top: Uncontrollable urges and ferociously dark humor from the most creative band of 2002.

LADYBUG- Light and Magic: A sophomoric album that improves on the then, now and tomorrow aesthetic that Ladytron effortlessly present.

INTERPOL- Turn on the Bright Lights: Mention Joy Division and I'll smack you. Besides, can you think of a better band to rip off?

OUTKAST- STANKONIA: Members of 311 reinvent Mogwai as a dance band and craft one of the most gorgeous instrumental albums in recent memory.

THE DEARING- Dashiki Battles the Pink Robots: America's weirdest band writes a musical accompaniment to an anime that was never shot.

A CERTAIN RATIO- Early: Criminally hearkened in "24 Hour Party People," the re-release of A Certain Ratio's best work shows just how influential they were.

DSB- DISCOPHONE #1: While these New York electro-clashers' album is awaiting an early 2003 release in the States, I couldn't wait. And neither should you.

SPORTS- Vintage Scars: Proving that his spirit of invention didn't die with At The Drive-In, Jim Ward and Sparta craft a magnificently intimate piece that puts emo to shame.

THE DILLINGER ESCAPE PLAN- Irony Is a Dead Scene: The most forward-thinking band in hardcore recruits musical mastermind Mike Patton to disprove the post 9/11 mantra that irony no longer has a place in art.

CENTAUR- In Streams: The long awaited return from Matt Talbott of Hum brings the singer out from behind the distortion to produce a dreamy record that's at once subtle and indulgent.

THE HIVES DAZZLED AUDIENCES THIS YEAR WITH THEIR TALENTS, TAKING THE SPOTLIGHT FROM COSTUMEPARTS THE VINES loss of Run DMC's DJ, Jam Master Jay.

There's no real way of measuring the degree to which Run DMC has influenced the current world of popular music. Their mainstream success paved the way for every hip-hop outfit that came after them and turned rap music from a simple musical novelty into an appreciative art form. Sure, even Run DMC had its predecessors, but it was their mainstream crossover that brought the sounds and mentalities of the urban streets to a world wide audience, perhaps for the first time ever in music.

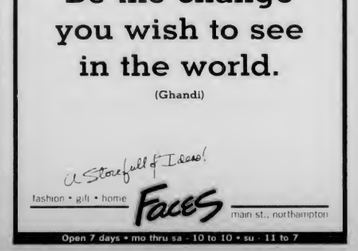
Jam Master Jay was Run DMC's "hand." He provided the beatboxes and the records that kept it all moving. Perhaps Ice Cube summed it up best when he compared Run DMC to the Beatles of hip-hop on a Conan O'Brien episode shortly after Jam Master Jay's murder. Losing Jay is like losing a John Lennon or George Harrison. It may not seem like such a big loss at the moment, but judging by hip-hop's dominance on MTV and radio, it will certainly continue as a reigning force in music for at least as long as rock 'n' roll will.

VINES, HIVES AND STRIPES

Three of the biggest bands in the world at the moment are also the most unlikely. Who would have thought that Middle America would once again find it cool to embrace an album that sounds like your band could have mixed it in a studio apartment? Is This It was certainly one of the greatest summer albums to be released in a long time, but the parade that followed The Strokes debut was a shock even to the savviest indie-rox insiders. It was accompanied by a barrage of terms like "mod" and "garage" and a vigor determined to change modern rock radio forever. Everybody's talking about the new sound I guess, but it's still indie rock to me.

The White Stripes, a minimalist two piece Detroit outfit whose front man listens to blues and dresses like a Tim Burton superhero appeared everywhere from "Saturday Night Live" to The MTV Video Music Awards, always appearing very lost and confused about their newfound celebrity. Sweden's The Hives declared themselves our new favorite band and declared war on its lesser counterparts the Vines. Those who didn't reap the same worldwide exposure as these new "mod" bands (a troubling term since none of the bands dress similarly and none of them are even remotely mod-sounding) at least gained more respect than they probably would have. It soon seemed like post-9/11 New York was now a beacon of artistic integrity. Yeah Yeah Yeahs, Interpol, Radio 4, The Strokes, The Models and the like grew a multitudinously loyal fanbase and fused post-punk with funk, disco, electronica and an arsenal of effects and produced 2002's most exciting new music.

DFA Records



If anyone can be blamed for the new New York sound, it would have to be the superstar producing team DFA. Named after a Crispy Ambulance song, the duo brought knowledge of electronic music to the punk rock scene in Brooklyn. James Lavelle is also one-half of DJ Shadow's UNKLE project and both have produced work for Massive Attack, Trans Am, Primal Scream, Le Tigre, and Radio 4. In 2002, the group began distributing records on its own DFA records and it seems like every single one has turned to little nuggets of indie gold.

The Rapture's "House of Jealous Lovers" transported a mediocre and sloppy Seattle post-punk band into the spaceminded hot New York Screw "Bloodflowers," the DFA's remix of "Ohio" by the Rapture sounds like the real long-awaited sequel to The Cure's "Disintegration" complete with screeching vocals and swelling house beats. The Juan MacLean's "You Can't Have it Both Ways" showed up the synthpop revival with nine minutes of dark pop bliss. LCD Soundsystem raged against music collecting fascists whose finders-keepers approach towards "their" music is being gleefully destroyed by a new generation of open-minded youth. "I'm losing my edge/ to better looking people/ with better ideas and more talent. Who are actually quite nice." "Beat Connection," the B-side to their solo and essential single laments the cold dancing environment that the ecstasy generation has brought. The death of that sterility is on its way, however, thanks in no small part to the DFA catalogue.

ELECTROCASH AND A DISCO PARADISE

As a general trend, the music of yesterday always ironically sounds fresher than the music of today. The worst music, in the electroclash is so heavily steeped in 80's nostalgia that it sounds like crappy Ultravox cover bands. The ones that are not sound more like the music of today than any recent trend in electronic music has managed to spurn out. With roots in performance art and often (though not always) adhering to a unique fashion standard, electroclash began to slowly emerge from the clubs into the public consciousness. Music videos by Felix da Housecat and Miss Kittin and the Hacker made the rounds on MTV2 and Larry Tee (the genius of the rather stupid genre term electroclash) took his now annual Electroclash festival on the road. The Misfits' remix of "Electroclash" is a great applies to a range of bands from those normal artists like New York's YRT weapons to Scotland's Chicks on Speed to punks Bis to Omaha dynamos The Faint.

Coinciding with the explosion of neo-Human League aesthetic that made it think up and humanity-ravaged dance further is bollocks, the music scene's dance. Playgroup (Ultra Beat, Metro Area and other dedicated artists struggled and succeeded in figuring out how Corrine the Human League, Daft Punk and The Crystal Method could live together (Soundtrack of our house: Check out Playgroup - part mix on the Astralwerks website for just how glo-rious it can be).

BUT IS IT PUNK?

While Wikipedia hath wrought is not enough to dismiss the band's four amazing studio albums (and continued 2001's tradition of putting out whatsupadoguns from the bilingual and listless "emo" category. Some bands did not claim to be punk but whose success can almost be single-handedly blamed on this "mainstream" music. The founders of Jimmy Eat World of Spring Sunny Day Real Estate and Texas is the real deal this sprang forth from a group of musical and ethical hardcore misfits whose political statements had been reduced to "Black Flag's "TV Party" without the irony. Now the music, whose meditated personal introspections ushered in a era where it was just as punk to be Rainer Maria Wilke as Sid Vicious has stopped the save and is killing off punk for good. Gone are the existential angst and self-revelation which were so perfectly woven between every instrument in favor of rock radio's dick N Sync's composers would be ashamed to have written. Even Blink 182 opted out of their beer guzzling, Bloodhound Gang-lite approach to lay their hand at an emo album with Box Car Racer.

Going hand in-hand with the downfall of punk is the arrival of straight-up cheerleading squad music at Avril Lavigne, whose fashion designer has fooled people into thinking she's punk. Please. Jem and the Holograms were more punk she will ever be. The spirit of rebellion in punk rock must have split with the emergence of "alternative" in the My So-Called Life era that we called the 1990's, because the dominating bands in the punk scene now seem to only reinforce the idea that those four letters are now simply nothing more than a name.

WACKO JACKO FALLS IN THE FOREST, NO ONE LISTENS

Perhaps jealous that R. Kelly has now become the new poster boy for sexual deviants and disturbed that fusim Timberlake has somehow morphed into himself, Michael Jackson continued to struggle for relevance by attacking the record industry and faking human facial dimensions to uncharted territory. Regardless of whether you think the man is psychotic or not (and those who saw footage of him hanging a baby over a hotel balcony can vouch that he is), his allegations of racism in the executive offices of Sony were never fully explored. Every article that came out after Jackson's attacks refused to even consider his claims and instead used the opportunity to take cheap shots at a man who is already on his ass down. The issue of racism is still very real in this country and should not be taken lightly regardless of the accuser. Whether Jackson's claims were founded or not may never be known.

CONCERTS

Though I went to some great shows by Galactic, Tool, Radio 4, Sonic Youth and awesome local talent from The Sharks, Blame the Victim and the Missing Lance Project, the one show that warrants the most mention is the Village Voice's Annual SXSW Festival.

In late July, thousands of indie kids descended on Coney Island, NY for a free dashing celebration of the best underground music. It was gorgeous day and between acts we indulged in the freezing cold beaches that lined Manhattan's shores and the tickets Cyclone among other recreational activities at our disposal. To say that Meister Kilmes was the headlining act should give you a clue as to the size of the acts. Excellent performance by Liars, The Mooney Suzuki, Rye Coalition, Yeah Yeah Yeahs and a traveling sideshow of drag queens and freaks scorched the already hot summer air and showed why music is still important. The most fulfilling part of the day, however, was being around an enlightened and genuinely friendly community of kids who were proof that the predictions in I-D Soundsystem's "Losing my Edge" were actually coming true. Any one not excited about music right now is obviously not listening hard enough.

Cage's aura comes through

GLEN STRAUB

The fighting was dirty, the space around the court was tight, the old wooden bleachers were wears on everyone's toeshoes and the sound system made ears shrill, but the boost the fans gave the home team last night is what will be best remembered in the return of UMass basketball to the Curry Hicks Cage.

The gym was not filled by any means. The two main sections on the sidelines of the court were about three quarters filled, while the endcourt sections had maybe 20 spectators between the two of them.

But the noise generated by the 821 fans in attendance at the 72-year-old basketball haven more than matched any decibel level created by a 7,000-plus crowd in the Minutewomen's usual home – the Mullins Center.

EIGHTH-SEEDED TWENTY-ONE FANS SHOWED UP AT THE WOMEN'S FIRST GAME AT THE CURRY HICKS CAGE SINCE 1995. IT WAS HIGHEST ATTENDANCE FIGURE OF THE SEASON FOR THE MINUTEWOMEN TO DATE.

The sudden belting of screams at the 9:32 mark after Ebony Pegues scores her 10th straight point on a slashing move to the hoop.

Chants of defense accompanied with stomping feet after Amber Sneed puts her team up by six at 50-44, with five minutes to go.

A loud BOO in unison from the crowd after Jen Butler is called for a questionable offensive foul under the UMass rim.

The standing ovation after the Minutewomen pull off their biggest win of the year – a 55-50 victory over Villanova.

These moments added up to one of the finest events the UMass basketball program has been apart of in a while.

"It was more personable," Pegues said. "It felt great [to have the game in the Cage]," Butler said. "It was louder than any other home game we have had and the whole experience was real fun."

It was the first time the Minutewomen played a regular season game in the Cage since an 80-52 trouncing over Temple on Feb. 18, 1995, and the reopening of this past staple of UMass basketball was by all means a success.

"The atmosphere was tremendous," Athletic Director Ian McCaw said. "The Sports Management department did a great job of putting this together and the win made the night even better."

McCaw announced at the start of the season that the Minutewomen's Dec. 11 game against Villanova would be played at the Cage in hopes of gaining a feeling of nostalgia and increased fan interest.

But it is hard to say if a new generation of UMass fans came out to see the now 7-1 Maroon and White squad. It was the same old diehard followers of UMass athletics that bleed maroon and white that made up the turnout. The same locals who were around to see "Doctor J" sky over visiting opponents were watching the 2002-03 Minutewomen play possibly their best game of the year against Villanova – a team that on paper is a far superior club.

Jack Leaman, who coached 343 games as men's coach between the years of 1966-79 and 26 games in a one-year stint as the women's coach in the 1986-87 season was one of those old-time UMass diehards enjoying the return of the "Rage in the Cage."

"It was like the old days, it was a lot of fun," Leamen said. "The crowd was great, both teams were aggressive and this is fantastic for the seven seniors on this team."

The return to the Cage for the women's team was a complete success and the fans were definitely the sixth man in the win. So the question is, will any more games be played in the Cage? Possibly a men's game?

UMass men's coach Steve Lappas, who came to watch his new school face-off with the club coached by his former colleague, Villanova coach Harry Perretta, said it would be great if the men could play a game in the Cage, but the idea is just not plausible.

"The atmosphere was very circus-like which made it great," Lappas said. "But since we have season-ticket holders it would be incredibly difficult to have a game here. I wish it was that easy because this would be a great place to play."

EBONY PEGUES (WITH BALL) SCORED 15 POINTS, ALL IN THE SECOND HALF, FIVE ASSISTS AND TWO STEALS IN LAST NIGHT'S 55-50 WIN OVER VILLANOVA.

With 3:55 to go, UMass led 53-47.

An offensive foul on Jennifer Butler with 1:35 to go gave the Wildcats the ball. But Juhline missed a free throw, and the Minutewomen came back down the floor, leading 53-50 with a minute left.

UMass struggled early, hampered by 10 first-half turnovers, and was unable to efficiently work its offense. Juhline and Davis spearheaded the Nova offense, with one taking over if the other got shut down.

With 45 seconds left in the first half, UMass sophomore Katie Nelson chipped away at Nova's momentum with a 3-pointer from five feet beyond the arc.

Nelson had a chance to knot the game before the break, but was apparently fooled by the shot clock. Thinking there were only a few seconds left instead of the 10 that actually remained, she launched a shot from just past midcourt that missed.

With the win, UMass improves its record to 7-1, the team's best start since its inaugural year, when it won nine straight to start the season.

Villanova drops to 6-1.

The difference for the Minutewomen came at the foul line. While the teams were even from the field, including five more treys on 22 more attempts, the Maroon and White outpaced the Cats by 10 points at the stripe.

UMass is now 3-1 when trailing at halftime, a trend Dacko would rather break.

"I don't want to trail at halftime," she said. "I'd like to be up at halftime, I'd like to be up at the end of the game."

Pegues, who at times continued to make mental mistakes with no points and two turnovers in the first half, was the hero for her second half explosion.

"She's very capable of shooting when she's open," Dacko said of her 5-foot-6-inch guard. "Instead what she did was she got turnovers, and she created those turnovers. If she can just step up and take the shot rather than go up and lay it up with her right hand. But like I've said, she can light it up at any time, she's tremendous."

Miami's Dorsey, McGahee among five Heisman finalists

By Andrea Stulsteyn
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK (AP) – Top-ranked Miami's Ken Dorsey and Willis McGahee are Heisman Trophy finalists, the first time since 1994 that teammates were among the top five in the voting.

Iowa quarterback Brad Banks, Penn State running back Larry Johnson and Southern California quarterback Carson Palmer also were invited Wednesday for the award's presentation.

The winner of one of the most wide-open Heisman races will be announced Saturday night at the Yale Club in New York.

The last time two players from the same school finished in the top five was eight years ago, when Penn State's Ki-Jana Carter was second and Kerry Collins fourth.

McGahee, a tailback who wasn't even supposed to start this season, would be the first sophomore to win the award given to college football's most outstanding player.

Palmer is trying to become the first West Coast player to win since USC's Marcus Allen in 1981.

Of the five finalists, only Dorsey opened the season as a true Heisman hopeful; he finished third in the 2001 voting and led Miami to a national title.

McGahee ended the 2001 season as Miami's starting fullback, but moved back to tailback because of injuries and broke several single-season records.

He shattered the school record with 27 touchdowns and also set school records for yards rushing (1,686), total yards (2,036), and 100-yard games (10). In last Saturday's 56-45 win over Virginia Tech, McGahee ran 39 times for a career-high 205 yards and broke a 69-year-old school record with six touchdowns.

"I doubt I can get it because I've only been on the scene for like one year, and I didn't do as much as Kenny or the other quarterbacks did," McGahee said recently. "I don't know what the Heisman means in their terms, but in my terms it means the best overall player who has been performing the best to help their school win and getting the job done."

Dorsey, a senior from Orinda, Calif., is 38-1 as a starter and led the Hurricanes to another unbeaten season at 12-0. Miami will play No. 2 Ohio State (13-0) in the Fiesta Bowl on Jan. 3.

Dorsey owns nearly every significant Miami passing record. This season, he completed 194 of 350 passes for 3,073 yards, 26 touchdowns and 10 interceptions.

Banks, meanwhile, never started a Division I-A game until this season, but it never looked that way.

The senior from Belle Glade, Fla., led the nation in passing efficiency, going 155-of-258 for 2,369 yards, 25 touchdowns and four interceptions. He also ran for 387 yards and five TDs on 73 carries, and was The Associated Press College Player of the Year.

He helped No. 3 Iowa notch its first 11-win season, its first unbeaten Big Ten season since 1922, and a berth in the Orange Bowl.

Johnson emerged late in the season. He finished with 2,015 yards rushing, only the ninth Division I-A player to top 2,000 in a season. His 341 yards receiving are the most ever by a Penn State running back, and his 2,575 all-purpose yards this year are a Penn State record and ninth best in NCAA history.

The senior from State College, Pa., set the school single-game rushing record with 327 yards against Indiana, No. 10 Penn State (9-2) will play in the Capital One Bowl against Auburn.

Palmer completed nearly 63 percent of his passes for 3,639 yards and 32 touchdowns with 10 interceptions this year, leading No. 5 USC (10-2) to the Orange Bowl against Iowa.

The senior from Laguna Niguel, Calif., particularly shined during the Trojans' final eight games, throwing for 2,676 yards and 27 touchdowns with seven interceptions. He ended the season with 425 yards passing and four touchdowns in a 44-13 victory over Notre Dame. It was the most yards passing ever allowed by the Fighting Irish.

"It's been an amazing year," Palmer said this week. "As far as really thinking you're going to win it, you can't even fathom it. At the beginning of the season, I wanted to be at the Heisman ceremony. It's such a long shot, so many things have to go right."

This year's race should again be close. Last year, there was no clear favorite for the Heisman and only four finalists were announced. Nebraska quarterback Eric Crouch ended up beating Florida quarterback Rex Grossman by 62 points, the fourth-closest vote in the 67-year history of the Heisman.

The closest Heisman vote was Bo Jackson's 43-point victory over Chuck Long in 1985.

paper and we have to realize that. They're a struggling team right now and we have to take advantage of it."

However, Cahoon and assistant coach Mark Dennehy, who worked under Cahoon for three years with the Tigers, are about the only people for whom the trip will bring back nostalgia. No current Minuteman has played a college game there, and the team hasn't been there for five years to the day, when the Tigers dispatched the Maroon and White in overtime, 4-3.

"I don't mind playing on the road," said Turner, who is 10th on UMass' all-time scoring list. "I've never played at Princeton so it will be fun to see the rink and go there. We're not too bad on the road this year, so it should be a fun game."

The personnel for the Minutemen will be altered slightly for the trip as a pair of defensemen – senior Kelly Sickaish and sophomore Jeff Lang – likely will not make the trip due to injury, according to Cahoon.

"We've got a couple of people dinged up but I'm not sure what their status will be as of tomorrow," he said. "Other than that, system-wise we won't deviate too much from what we've been doing."

In goal, the Minutemen will likely be led by freshman Gabe Winer, who has had some struggles as of late, but still has been one of the most solid young goaltenders in the country.

"His gut feeling is that with a couple of weeks off, we'll probably go with Gabe because we need to keep him fresh going into the [Everblades] tournament," Cahoon said.

The Minutemen are coming off a weekend split with Boston University that was emotionally and physically draining. After one of the program's most important victories on Friday, UMass followed up with a lackluster performance at Walter Brown Arena, losing 5-1.

"We were disappointed," Turner said. "BU was a fragile team and we felt we could take four points or at least three from them. All in all, I'd say it was good to get a split, but after Friday's game, I would have liked to get four points."

Cahoon is not expecting a letdown today after an emotional, hard-fought weekend against his alma mater.

"There better not be [a letdown] because we got beat on Saturday, so there's no justification for it whatsoever," Cahoon said. "Who are we to not try to win every game we can possibly win? It was a nice win on Friday, but that's ancient history. We've got a lot of hockey ahead of us."

Despite the fact that the Minutemen are playing a non-conference opponent for the fourth time in six games, the game has a tremendous impact in terms of momentum and confidence heading into break.

"It's a big game for us," Turner said. "We've had a pretty good first half of the year and the last thing you want to do is end the half on a bad note. It gives us confidence going into the second half."

Cahoon agreed.

"We've worked really hard to have a respectable first half and to compromise that would be very painful for all of us," he said.

"It would be a feather in our cap to win 10 games in the first half," he continued. "It would be a feather in our cap to run the board with the ECAC teams we've played this year. It would be a feather in our cap to be in the top 15 going into Christmas break and I think a win this Thursday would do just that. I think we're on the bubble right now. I don't think it means a whole lot right now except that we're doing a decent job and that we're winning some games. I hope the kids pay attention to that and it that motivates them, all the better."

THOMAS BUCK AND THE MINUTEMEN WILL LOOK FOR THEIR 10TH VICTORY BEFORE CHRISTMAS TONIGHT AT PRINCETON. THE PROGRAM HAS NEVER ACHIEVED THE FEAT.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You won't find yourself waiting around too much today; be prepared to swing into action early on – and to keep it up all day long.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Now is no time to neglect your home in any way. Keep things neat and tidy, and don't forget to make those changes and improvements you've planned.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Take care that you're not living too much in your head at this time. Trust something that you're not likely to forget. Take care you don't get burnt out.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – What begins with excitement is likely to develop quickly today into something that you're not likely to forget. Take care you don't get burnt out.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – What you need to know now is how to spend some time time-managing. The major push is over; now it's time once again to concentrate on the details.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You may have reason to regret a recent decision today, but before long you'll realize that you are indeed on the right road.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You needn't take things quite so seriously today — and yet you want will surely be taken seriously as you wish, nonetheless.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Don't lose sight of things you must want to attain. It may mean you have to go without something in order to acquire something else.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Someone close to you is likely to want to get even closer today, and the responses he or she gets from you are likely to surprise both of you!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – The more unusual it is, the more you're going to like it – whether at the workplace or at home. You may want someone else to call the shots for right now.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – The unlikely may well prove likely today – and vise versa. You may have to enter a new realm of activity today in order to address certain issues.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You may come in contact with someone who knows how to make sense of issues you've found difficult or even impenetrable. Try joining forces.

UMass derails 'Nova

Hands Wildcats first loss of the season

By Andrew Merritt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If you looked around the Curry Hicks Cage last night, you might think the fan turnout was disappointing.

But if you closed your eyes and listened during key moments of the Massachusetts women's basketball team's come-from-behind 55-50 win over Villanova, you would be transported to a packed house reminiscent of the rollicking crowds of the mid to late 1970s.

UMass	55
Villanova	50

Two seniors, Jennifer Butler for UMass and Katie Davis for Nova, led the scoring with 16 points apiece on the night. But Butler, who notched her sixth double-double of the season (12 rebounds), was supplemented by classmates Ebony Pegues (13 points) and Nekole Smith (14 points).

The first half was owned by the Wildcats, who jumped out to an early lead and held it through the first frame with a 27-25 edge at halftime. Senior Trish Jublinc led with 11 first-half points, but managed only two more in the second.

"I think in the first half we got lulled into playing like them, slowing down," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "We scouted them. We knew what they were going to do, but they present an outside challenge and we didn't match up well. [In the] first half, we had some opportunities that we didn't capitalize on, and we were lucky to come out of it 27-25."

The second half opened up with a pair of Villanova fouls to senior Nicole Druckenmiller and junior Jeanine Johnson. Nekole Smith converted both free throws on the second foul at 19:02 to tie the game for the first time since the tip.

The Minutewomen took the lead on the next play, with a jump shot from Ebony Pegues at 18:15, her first points of the game. She followed up with another basket to give the Maroon and White a 6-0 run to start the half.

Pegues scored 10 straight UMass points over a 4:31 span, culminating in a splendid inside move for two points with 11 minutes to go. During her run, she drained a pair of three-pointers, and added two more points from the line.

The first half saw Villanova make just enough baskets to stay ahead of their hosts. In the second half, the teams flip-flopped, with the Minutewomen leading, but unable to pull away.

A brand new day

By Jim Pignatiello
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Needless to say, Massachusetts men's basketball coach Steve Lappas' first game of the season begins tomorrow at home against Florida International.

"We just went through a six-game exhibition schedule," Lappas said at Wednesday's UMass Sports Luncheon. "Our real season starts on Saturday."

The second-year coach made a similar statement at the Hartford Civic Center Tuesday night after his team, playing in their fifth game against a 2002 NCAA Tournament entrant, saw a 30-9 halftime lead over No. 9 Connecticut for a 59-48 loss – its fifth in six games.

"We did a great job tonight, we played as hard as we could," Lappas said after the game. "There's no such thing as moral victories, but as I told the guys on the team, the way I look at it, these six games that we've played were our learning period, our exhibition season and, now, the season really starts for us on Saturday."

Reactions to that statement shocked many, as if the former Villanova coach was claiming that UMass wasn't trying to win those first six games. But Lappas has been trying to make the point all along that his first six games against some very tough competition would be tough with such a young team.

Starting Saturday, the Minutemen should be favored to win in each of the next four games. Taking on Florida International, Lafayette, Rider and Marshall, a 5-5 record by the New Year is possible if they carry Tuesday's determination into game one of Lappas's second season.

"I think it bodes well for our guys as long as we go out there and play with that kind of intensity and conviction [on display against Connecticut]," Lappas said.

"We knew what we wanted to do [in that game] and we went out there and really did our best to do it," he added.

Prior to the Connecticut game, Lappas decided to scrap the motion offense for the contest, instead running all set plays in Tuesday's loss. Lappas felt the change would help his rookies and junior point guard Anthony Anderson, a preseason Atlantic 10 all-conference third-team selection, who disappointed in the team's first five games.

Anderson responded with 13 points and just one turnover in 40 minutes of play – including a ferocious second-half fullcourt press.

Lappas isn't getting rid of the motion offense all together. Expect him to slowly get his team back to it. He'll probably have the team using it in full force by the end of winter break.

On Monday, Lappas acknowledged that his veteran starting lineup would remain for the UConn game, but didn't rule out the possibility of changing the lineup for the FIU game Saturday.

Youngsters Mike Lasme (7.5 points per game to go with some in-your-face defense), Gabe Lee (10-for-20 from the field and some gutsy play underneath) and Brennan Martin (7-for-13 on 3-pointers, zero turnovers and four steals in 62 minutes) have all made a case for a starting job. But whether they have done enough to unseat any one of the starters remains to be seen.

Meanwhile, two new faces lead Florida International. Forward Eulius Baez and guard Junior Matias, both from Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, headed to FIU from the all-time wins leader in National Junior College Athletic Association (NJCAA) history, Southeastern (Iowa) Community College, for their junior year. The duo has combined for 29.5 points per game in their first seven games with the Golden Panthers.

Baez is averaging 9.8 rebounds per game and shooting 59.4 percent (41-for-69) from the field, while Matias has turned the ball over just eight times all season.

The Golden Panthers started the season 4-0, including a 58-55 win in one of the toughest places to play in the nation – Princeton University. Baez played 45 minutes in that game, scoring 14 points and grabbing 11 rebounds.

FIU has struggled of late, however, losing its last three games to George Washington (77-63), Wisconsin-Milwaukee (61-48) and Samford (64-54).

JUNIOR POINT GUARD ANTHONY ANDERSON SCORED 13 POINTS AND COMMITTED JUST ONE TURNOVER IN TUESDAY'S 59-48 LOSS TO NO. 9 CONNECTICUT. THE MINUTEMEN WILL RETURN TO ACTION SATURDAY NIGHT AGAINST FIU AT THE MULLINS CENTER.

SOPHOMORE GREG MALCOLM NOTCHED ONE GOAL AND TWO ASSISTS IN UMASS' FIRST MATCHUP WITH PRINCETON, A 5-1 MAROON AND WHITE WIN ON DEC. 1.

Hockey goes for 10th win

By Matt Brady
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It may not be a home game for his team, but Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon will certainly feel like he's at home.

The third-year coach and his troops head south today to do battle with Princeton – where Cahoon coached from 1991-2000 – in their final contest before the two-week winter break. The Minutemen (9-6-0, 4-5-0 Hockey East) do not play again until the Everblades College Classic at the end of December, and have the opportunity to enter the break with 10 wins for the first time ever.

"It will be nice to go back and see the people that I became close with and friendly with," Cahoon said. "It's a great school and I've had a lot of people contact me and say they would see me at the game. Hopefully I can avoid getting distracted by all that and pay close attention to the job at hand."

The Maroon and White defeated the Tigers (1-12-0, 1-9-0 East Coast Athletic Conference) at home a week and a half ago, 5-3. Five different Minutemen scored in the game, as UMass jumped out to a 4-0 lead and barely held off the Tigers the rest of the way.

"I don't think we're going to make too many adjustments, we just have to play our game," senior captain Tim Turner said. "We just have to come to the game ready to play and play hard. We know we're a better team than them but we have to have a mindset that anyone can win the game. The game's not played on

University of Massachusetts Amherst

10th Anniversary Commemoration

By Nikolas P. Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

The William D. Mullins Memorial Center opened in 1993, becoming a crown jewel of the University of Massachusetts.

The $48 million multi-purpose facility hosts most men's and women's basketball and hockey games, serves as a convention center for exhibitions, banquets and commencements, and offers a theater setting for both fine arts and rock concerts.

In 1985, Representative William D. Mullins of Ludlow, then the Vice Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, concluded that a large facility for the flagship campus of the University of Massachusetts system was in order, according to a pamphlet obtained from Ruth Yanka, Associate to the Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance. With 24,000 students and approximately 5,000 employees, the campus lacked a building on campus, or even within 25 miles, that could provide adequate seating for large events.

Representative Mullins called on the support of campus officials and legislative leaders and began building momentum to fund the facility's construction. After his death in 1986, Mullins' colleagues carried on his devotion to the project; House Speaker George Keverian and Senate President William Bulger jointly sponsored a bill to set aside state funds, which – in conjunction with a student fee – provided the resources to build the Mullins Center.

Capital outlay appropriation was passed in 1988 by the Legislature and signed by Governor Dukakis to provide the state portion of the Mullins Center's construction costs. The state Legislature contributed $25 million toward the project, and the University building authority raised the remaining amount by selling tax-free bonds.

By late October 1988, bonds for $23 million requested by the University Trustees (and passed by the UMass Building Authority) along with the $25 million from the state, enabled the project to begin.

Cambridge Seven Associates, designers of Boston's New England Aquarium, designed the Center. Suffolk Construction Company won bid for the job in December 1990. Construction began in January 1991 and was completed by winter 1992.

In 1992, the University picked the Ogden Entertainment Services Corporation (now known as SMG) to maintain and manage the Mullins Center. SMG (Spectator Management Group), the largest private management company in the world, also runs the Worcester Centrum Centre, the Compaq Center in Houston and the Pepsi Arena in Albany. Amherst Campus Auxiliary Services Division manage the food and beverage concession.

"As a tribute to Representative Mullin's dedication to higher education and his deep interest in athletics in general and the UMass sports program in particular, the facility was named in his memory," the pamphlet reads.

The Mullins Center holds 9,493 seats for basketball, a little less for hockey, and approximately 3,200 for theater events. Seating for concerts fluctuates depending on the size of the performer's stage.

Both a beautiful building on the outside and inside, the Mullins Center has lured throngs of students, faculty and outsiders into the building since first opening on Jan. 31, 1993, sitting on the campus' western edge.

"It really is a beautiful facility," Nancy Beauchamp, executive director of the Mullins Center, said. "Everyone should be proud of this building."

Tied to a contract with SMG, Beauchamp has served as the executive director of the Mullins Center for more than three years. Beauchamp has worked in the arena management field for more than 20 years, including a 10-year stint at the Hartford Civic Center, Providence Civic Center and the Worcester Common Coliseum.

The Mullins Center's annual operational cost is about $1.9 million, including repair and replacement fees, according to Yanka. Different sources of revenue, including commissions, incentives from events, sponsorships and advertising help to offset the cost. The remaining debt annually runs from about $800,000 to $970,000, which the University pays for, according to Yanka.

By bringing in enough funds, administrators hope to keep the arena in top-top-shape.

"We're hoping by keeping strong funds there won't be deferred maintenance," Yanka said.

"I feel that the arena has been a good asset to the university," said Yanka. "We've gotten some pretty good events to this campus that we wouldn't have gotten otherwise. So I think it's been a good addition to the culture of the campus."

The venue has played home to performances by artists ranging from Elton John to Bob Dylan. Metallica and Aaron Metcalfe, the Harlem Globetrotters, David Copperfield, Sesame Street Live and the Wizard of Oz have all performed there.

The Center has attracted people from all over Massachusetts, Northern Connecticut, Vermont, New York and New Hampshire.

The Mullins Center is home to 44 athletic events annually: 14 UMass men's basketball and women's basketball games apiece and 16 UMass hockey games.

Trade shows (the popular J. Crew sale) make up 15 event days; family shows (Sesame Street) make up one event; rehearsals about three; religious conferences (church dates during the summer) about 25; graduations about three and lectures about two.

Today, the Mullins Center remains a prized possession at the University, but also faces a number of hurdles.

The Mullins Center tries to hold at least six concerts each year. As it begins its second decade, however, the Center faces a new, more hostile competitive landscape.

Outdoor facilities such as the Tweeter Center in Mansfield and the emergence of the larger FleetCenter in Boston have cut into the Center's ability to attract top performers.

A ring of smaller venues, such as the Worcester Centrum Centre, Mohegan Sun in Connecticut and the Tsongas Arena in Lowell, also has cut into the Mullins' position in the market.

"This is what I have to compete with in New England alone," said Beauchamp, pointing to a list of 14 venues in the region.

> Asked what type of celebration she has in mind, Beauchamp shared a few ideas. "It could be both an athletic or concert event," she said. "It could be a 10th anniversary of the games or a comedian." But what she would really like to see is a performance from Boston-based band Aerosmith, who performed at the Center once in 1993. "That would be a great 10th anniversary in my estimation," Beauchamp said, although she's strong to caution that no preparations have yet been made.

A new venue, the Harry Agganis Arena, now being built on the Boston University campus, will make it 15 when it opens in late 2004.

The checkerboard schedule is further complicated by the Mullins' status in the market.

The unique problem the Mullins Center confronts stems from its classification as a tertiary market, which puts the Center at a disadvantage in luring many top concert performers. The tertiary market means the Center population base is small in relation to the secondary (Worcester Centrum Centre) and primary (Boston's FleetCenter) markets.

"There are a number of acts that I can't go after because of the size of the venue," Beauchamp said. "*N Sync, The Dixie Chicks, Faith Hill, Tim McGraw, Phish. They are playing bigger venues because they can play the larger venues and fill them."

"Let's take John Mayer for example," Beauchamp said. "He's playing here now, but in two years time he's going to be able to play in larger venues like the FleetCenter."

Scheduling art performances is an art in itself and helps to make matters even more difficult, Beauchamp said.

"I try to budget seven to eight concerts a year," Beauchamp said. "The concert industry has changed quite a bit since I've started. Acts or events or performers when they would book their tours, they would route their tours in 100 cities and would plan many dates, and they would route their shows across many venues. Now when acts go on tour, they perform on 30 dates as venues have increased two or three fold."

Scheduling priority goes first to ticketed varsity athletic events, followed by graduate commencement and other university related events. Non-university events such as concerts and family shows receive third priority. Finally, UMass athletic teams receive fourth priority in scheduling practice.

"What happens is that [promoters] may be looking for a day that athletic events are booked and athletics have a priority," Beauchamp said. "The building was built for use with athletics and for other departments. The other events it puts on are to help the University with finances."

Besides athletic events, Beauchamp avoids booking concerts during breaks, long weekends and finals week. All of that leaves a very tight schedule for booking concerts that have high potential for selling out.

"That's my biggest challenge, to bring events and fill 10,000 seats," she said.

The Mullins Center has had a difficult time selling out many shows recently for a number of reasons, according to Beauchamp.

"What you have here is a population with a very limited income," she said. "It has to be the right show to get the right people to come."

But attracting family shows and seeing them sell well is a tough task in itself, said Beauchamp.

"This is not a family show market," she said. "It's a metropolitan area that makes family shows successful. When I was at the Providence Civic Center, we'd sell out shows of the circus."

Booking fine arts events has also been a difficult task, mostly due to the competition the Mullins Center faces with the Fine Arts Center.

"Because of the Fine Arts Center, we haven't done as many as I'd like," Beauchamp said. "I'd like to see more."

Even with the challenges of booking events and its tertiary market status, the Mullins Center staff continues to bring big name entertainment and family programs to the Pioneer Valley. Besides John Mayer, the Center has hosted concerts by the Counting Crows and Tool this semester alone.

Beauchamp said she would like to celebrate the 10th year anniversary of the Mullins Center with a bash, but due to the current problems the University has faced this year, now is not the appropriate time.

"I really wanted to put on an event," she said. "Right now, given the economic climate on this campus, the budget cuts, the number of retirements and layoffs, I would agree with administration, now is not the time to celebrate.

"Maybe when it's more appropriate to celebrate, maybe then it'll be a better time to put on a belated celebration," Beauchamp continued. "I see [a celebration] in the near future. I'm hoping that within a year we can do something."

Asked what type of celebration she has in mind, Beauchamp shared a few ideas.

"It could be both an athletic or concert event," she said. "It could be a 10th anniversary of the games or a comedian."

But what she would really like to see is a performance from Boston-based band Aerosmith, who performed at the Center once in 1993.

"That would be a great 10th anniversary in my estimation," Beauchamp said, although she's strong to caution that no preparations have yet been made.

The Mullins Center design includes a number of multi-purpose rooms, athletic offices, a green room (where band, cast and musicians relax when not working), press area, and visitor and home team locker rooms. The Massachusetts Room and the Concourse Conference Room are used as function rooms that can be used for banquets and events associated with performances in the main arena.

The Mullins Center is unique in that it does not have a centerhung scoreboard due to the pipes that run across the ceiling of the arena. The pipes are used for theatrical performances (i.e. to attach spotlights, etc.).

Other distinctive qualities include two Olympic size ice rinks. In addition, nearly one-third of the seats in the Center are upholstered for theatrical shows, when only one side of the venue is used. The men's basketball team helps make the Center one of the most televised venues in the region.

A unique aspect of the Mullins Center design is that it affords direct access to the outdoor playing fields for athletes in the spring and summer.

The Mullins Center also serves as a learning facility and internships are offered through the sport management department.

"We employ 200 to 300 students on a regular basis," Beauchamp said. "So the students are not only earning spending money, but they're gaining some business skills."

Looking ahead, the Mullins Center is preparing for Chancellor John V. Lombardi's inauguration, which is set for February.

At press time, no acts had been booked for next semester according to Beauchamp, although she constantly works on securing performers. She has sent out about 75 to 100 proposals in the last year alone.

When asked what the biggest challenge the Mullins Center faces, Beauchamp said, "continuing competition to bring in diverse and unique events that the community will support. That was my challenge when I got here, and that's still my challenge."

"It doesn't have to be concerts," she said in booking events. "I would like to see us utilize the theater setup a little bit more."

Student involvement in the Mullins Center hasn't been as strong as it should be, according to Beauchamp.

"I thought I'd see more student involvement in athletic events," she said. "I'd like to see a lot of students in this building making a lot of noise. This building is theirs."

As part of the contract with SMG, Beauchamp teaches a Facilities Management course as an adjunct professor in the sports management program. Increased promotion and the employment of two former students may help in luring more students to the Mullins Center.

"This past year the marketing and PR effort is not as strong as it should have been," she admitted. "I have two students in my class. They are looking for more student based involvement."

Four pedestrian car accidents raise questions on student safety

By Jamie Lee
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Researchers at the University of Massachusetts have found that younger drivers have trouble anticipating dangerous situations.

DAN ROYA/COLLEGIAN

"The findings here indicate that younger drivers are five to 10 times less likely to perceive risks in the road ahead than older drivers," said Donald Fisher, a professor in the Department of Mechanical and Industrial Engineering.

Fisher defines perceiving these "risks" as predicting the movement of physical elements ahead or hidden elements such as a pedestrian in a crosswalk crossing in front of an already stopped car. Younger drivers differ radically from older drivers in risk perception, Fisher said.

The research done in the Human Performance Lab (HPL) was recently published in the journal, Human Factors, and will be presented in January at the annual meeting of the Transportation Research Board in Washington, D.C. The research done in this particular HPL project was a collaboration between Fisher and graduate students Anuj Pradhan, Rosa DeRamus and Kim Hammel. A portion of the experiments are available on the HPL website. Fisher said that some of the scenarios used in the research may be utilized for driving schools in the future.

The study included 72 participants between the ages of 16 and 60 from the Amherst area and UMass. The volunteers were put through 16 different scenarios on a mid-level driving simulator. There are 20 mid-level driving simulators in the world and UMass has one of them. Only four of these are actually installed and fully operational. The vehicle used in the HPL is a Saturn sedan, facing three screens — one in front of the car and two on the sides. The car doesn't move, though the driver controls the car as they would on a roadway. The system provides wind, vehicle noises and Doppler shift. The simulator reads the driver's speed and direction while an eye tracker records the driver's eye movements.

One of the scenarios that runs on the simulator involves a car that is stopped in front of a crosswalk in one lane. There may or may not be a pedestrian in the

SGA meets semester goals and looks forward

By Kristin Shrewsbury
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a semester of young leadership, in which an almost entirely new Senate battled with budget cuts, addressed the funding of union contracts and dealt with multiple safety issues, the Student Government Association is looking ahead to the spring of 2003.

The fall semester at the University of Massachusetts left the SGA with multiple decisions to make. Major issues arose over the course the semester, such as a vote of no confidence by members of the union towards President William Bulger, a continuing stride to improve safety on campus, and a newly implemented police dog.

The SGA, however, has made progress towards improving student life on campus one of its main goals heading into the new year. Members of the SGA's executive cabinet posed goals early in the semester, looking to make changes the student body would notice.

A new bar in the Blue Wall Cafe was one of its first strides in bringing campus life back to UMass. President Dave Carr spearheaded the proposal along with his Executive Cabinet and Auxiliary Services. Carr explained that on a daily basis the Campus Center is hoping to make quota, and by bringing a bar back, it would not only increase revenue but also bring students back to the center of campus.

"It's finalized and a bar is going to be in the Blue Wall by the first day of next semester," Carr said. "We're looking to make last call later than that of in town. We're still working out the minor details, but we're going to have a huge grand opening when it is complete."

Speaker of the Senate Dan Saunders shared in the excitement of the new bar in the Blue Wall. Saunders explained that he felt it was great to be refocusing student energy onto campus.

"I'm pretty psyched. It's great to put energy towards the middle of campus," Saunders said.

The Senate also tackled issues surrounding safety on campus. After last year's budget cuts, programs such as the Escort Service were eliminated. Members of the SGA faced these issues and in turn developed a Select Committee on Public Safety.

Other matters faced by the SGA this semester included multiple issues with the UMass unions. The seven unions on the UMass campus were denied their approved pay increases for the 2002-2003 school year. Acting Governor Jane Swift announced her veto of the promised pay increase in August. Faculty, students and administrators have continued to rally in an effort to get Swifts decisions revoked, and have since called a vote of no confidence towards Bulger.

"We as the SGA completely agree with funding the union contracts and we would take drastic measures if something was well articulated," Saunders said. "This is the strongest message that you can send and it's something that we would need to think long and hard about doing. It has not come down to us to call for a vote of no confidence, but if it does then we'll see."

Issues surrounding pay increases again arose when the UMass Board of Trustees attended meetings at the UMass campus. Protests occurred outside, as well as inside the Mullins Center, as union members pleaded for support.

"We urge you to join us to persuade a vote in the House of Representatives to override Governor Jane Swift's veto," President of the Massachusetts Society of Professors Ronald Story said. "Mr. President, please lend a voice to this campaign for the hour is growing very late."

Since the Board of Trustees open meeting, Bulger has stated that he is behind the University and funding their contracts. Members of the SGA were notified of actions taken by Bulger and announced to the Senate that Bulger had proposed to the State of Massachusetts a budget increase, and that funding of the approved union contracts go through as well.

"I just wanted to let you all know that President Bulger has submitted [a request] for an increase in our budget to the state and separately a proposal that the union contracts be funded," Carr said. "This is a positive change in the right direction."

The latest challenge faced by the SGA is regarding Mass. the new University police dog. The new dog is set to begin his job in February, however, issues within the SGA and Senate arose over the actions taken to get the dog on campus, as well as what its role will be upon arrival.

"We need to talk and see if the drug problems on this campus are that large, because this means that there is a larger problem with the culture, Resident Advisors and campus, and that is something that needs to be looked at differently," Saunders said.

Members of the SGA met with the Vice Chancellor Joanne Vincan and Police Chief Barbara O'Connor to discuss the decisions made. Saunders questioned whether or not the dog was here for drug busts or for student safety.

"I had a good conversation with Chancellor Vincan and Police Chief O'Connor and as of right now it's not in writ-thy as to what the dog will do, but some February issues we'll be having future conversations. This is the first time in awhile all three of us have been on the same page about an issue like this," Saunders said.

Members of the Senate, however, further questioned the actions of the dog by requesting a motion in the Senate requesting that the police dog be used purely for police matters and not random dormitory searches.

"Right now it's just a concern for students' civil rights, and it's not about students being attacked," Chair of Administrative Affairs Chris Eckel said. "Earlier this year the SGA was asked about Max and we really didn't think it was a good idea. The police have never had the ability to just walk in the dorms and go by your rooms, and this gives them the option to do this and I'm a little surprised."

The Senate passed the motion.

In closing, members congratulated themselves on their accomplishments and looked toward the future.

"I just wanted to thank you all for coming and sticking it out," Carr said. "As you can see by your agendas there are a lot of things that you are pushing for and that's great. Dan and I are going to be here and the senators who are working for the students and if one wants to chat, help or have questions, give us a call."

Greek housing for freshman questioned

By Courtney Charles
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Should second semester freshmen be prohibited from living in Greek housing to prevent alcohol abuse?

An alcohol abuse task force recommended this as one of the steps the campus community should consider in order to stop alcohol abuse.

"We were under the impression it was a task force, not a legislative body," said Blake Kleppe, a sophomore member of the Student Government Association Senate and Sigma Phi Epsilon. "They see alcohol abuse different than the students."

"My point is that alcohol is not a problem that starts in college. It begins lower than that, in high school," said Jarret Marcoux, a member of Sigma Phi Epsilon and former resident advisor in Southwest.

"The alcohol task force is important. The issue needs to be correctly addressed," said Michael Wiseman, Director of Greek Affairs. "Alcohol abuse is a concern of the campus fraternity and sorority systems. A lot of students are not happy. I can see their point."

"I find living in a fraternity more quiet than the dorms during the weekdays, which is the time when most schoolwork gets completed," Marcoux said. "While being an RA in the Patterson-Mackimmie cluster, I was highly exposed to college freshmen during their adjustment period and I know that just as much drinking happens in the dorms [as] in any off campus housing, including fraternities."

According to Kleppe, the motion stating that freshmen should be allowed to live in pre-approved Greek housing was passed in the SGA long before the alcohol task force made its recommendation. He said that as an SGA member, he went to all the campus-affiliated fraternity houses and surveyed the occupants.

"Roughly 33 percent of people living in all Greek fraternities are freshmen and sophomores," Kleppe said. "One hundred percent of the houses said they felt it was imperative to have freshmen and sophomores living there. They said they wouldn't have the ability to exist without them."

"I know a lot of houses on frat row have a lot of underclassmen, so it's harmful for them. We generally don't so it doesn't really affect us," Josh Sturtenevant, president of Sigma Phi Epsilon said. "I don't think it's a good idea. I don't see how they think freshmen can get a better experience living in the dorms."

According to Sturtenevant, the overall grade point average of people living in Greek housing is higher than that of students living on campus. He said that fraternities are involved in intramurals and perform community service.

Wiseman said this is true only in sororities. He said not all fraternities have a higher GPA than the on-campus average.

"No, I don't think it could harm the Greek system. Some people out there think it will improve," Wiseman said. "It may hurt an individual chapter if half the house residents goes abroad in the spring."

As of last night, according to Kleppe, the Senate asked for student representation on the alcohol task force and to review all decisions being made.

Wiseman said that more of a middle ground should be taken with the recommendation. He offered the idea that a decision should be made on a case-by-case basis, depending on the student's academic record and the reputation of the chapter.

"This would make the chapters more motivated to improve themselves," Wiseman said.

All parties need to be represented in this decision, according to Wiseman. There needs to be active engagement, he said.

"The Greeks feel the recommendation was made without them being consulted," Wiseman said.

According to Wiseman, it needs to be broader than just the four or five students that would be involved in the committee. He suggested open meetings on campus for all involved to attend. Another suggestion he had was smaller meetings where students could meet with members of the task force.

"People need to have the opportunity to engage in a forum," Wiseman said. "People need to have a chance to be heard."

crosswalk and the driver's response is monitored.

"Five percent of younger drivers look, while 50 to 60 percent of older drivers look," Fisher said.

This situation actually took place during the first car-pedestrian accident this year, when a car struck freshman Jessica Moody in a crosswalk in Southwest. Moody was struck in a crosswalk on University Drive in September, when a car passed an already stopped vehicle in the crosswalk. Moody sustained a head injury and was treated and released from Bay State Medical Center.

There have been four car-pedestrian accidents this semester, making it the busiest year for these types of accidents since 1999. In November, Jared R. Cariddi sustained a broken leg and head injuries when he was struck by a car on East Pleasant Street. Earlier, in late October, a female student was struck in a crosswalk by the Mullins Center and was treated and released by Cooley Dickinson Hospital. On Sept. 22, 18-year-old Shandralee Lerro, of South Boston, was struck in a crosswalk near the Southwest horseshoe. Lerro was treated at Cooley Dickinson Hospital and released shortly after.

Fisher said the simulations in the lab are incredibly realistic and are problems that drivers encounter every day. Most of it is a matter of just being aware while driving.

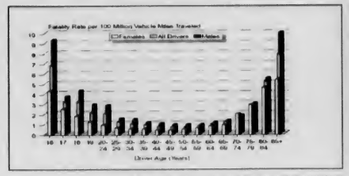
"These risks that we're trying to get people to predict aren't ones like an asteroid coming out of the sky falling and hitting them," Fisher said. "They're real risks that you and I, as drivers, should be able to predict."

Fisher found that college aged drivers had better risk perception than younger drivers but were no where close to older drivers. Twenty-year-olds in the above-mentioned scenario looked for danger 50 percent of the time, while 60-year-old drivers looked at least 70 percent of the time. The group with the highest fatality rate was younger drivers between the ages of 16 and 17 who had less than six months of driving experience. They were nine times more likely to die in a crash than drivers between the ages of 20 and 65. Fisher doesn't attribute this to age rather than to their lack of experience on the road.

There are many other potential scenarios that happen on the roadways such as cars hidden from view turning onto a road. And, of course, drivers are not the only people to blame. Fisher said pedestrians also hold some responsibility in being more cautious. However, he feels some of them simply forget to look. Fisher said the lab has not done studies on pedestrian reaction in crosswalks as of yet.

Fisher said one way to reduce car-pedestrian accidents in crosswalks at UMass that has been successful in other locations, is moving the yield line in front of the crosswalk up 10 yards. This would create more space between cars and pedestrians, and more room for cars to brake in case they missed the line.

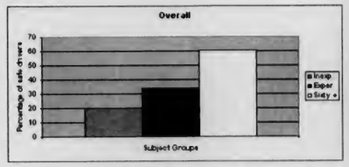
"There's a real chance that moving those yield lines forward of the crosswalk could reduce considerably the number of new fatalities," Fisher said.



Another solution that may be more expensive includes having lights embedded in crosswalks that would light up if there was a pedestrian present. Fisher worries, however, that a system like this could fail easily. Fisher believes that education around these issues will help and he is working with an officer in UMPD to re-create some of the accidents that have happened on campus. A split screen model might be able to show the driver's and pedestrian's point of view if they were to research both simultaneously according to Fisher. He hopes that their research will be able to educate not only drivers, but pedestrians as well, about making more careful choices while in the crosswalk. Especially in the common scenario at UMass where there are two lanes and one car is stopped.

"I just don't think the majority of pedestrians crossing bring that scenario up," Fisher said. "Hopefully we can get to the pedestrian."

Other projects that the HPL has been working on include a drive on a virtual version of the Big Dig. The Web Big Dig shows details of various sections of the project including the Central Artery tunnel sections of Interstate 93 north and southbound. Researchers at the HPL helped the Massachusetts Highway Department design different signs for the highway project. According to Fisher, this is the first federal highway project in the country to utilize this type of research.



"There are multiple problems with the signage in the Big Dig," Fisher said. "These problems come about because of the floor to ceiling height."

Fisher said that while most highway signs are six feet in height, signs in the tunnel parts of the Big Dig can only be three feet high, a small space for some vital information.

DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL/OPINION

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM WRITE TO THE DAILY COLLEGIAN EDITORIAL BOARD AT LETTERS TO THE ED@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM ED/OP EDITOR: JAMIE LOO

Enjoy winter break; see you next spring

This is the final issue of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian for the Fall 2002 semester. It's been a good ride and we hope you've enjoyed reading the paper as much as we have putting it out.

There has been plenty to pay attention to: the ongoing budget crisis, the fallout of the investigation into President Bulger and the largest drug bust on this campus in the past three decades. With the most comprehensive coverage of UMass Athletics around, our sports staff has kept you informed of the big name squads (football, hockey and basketball) as well as all the other teams, including cross country, field hockey and soccer. Arts and Living has provided coverage of local entertainment events in addition to the latest in music, movies, and television. Our Editorial staff has also represented a number of student opinions, including your own letters to the Editor.

We'll be back stronger than ever this Spring with numerous improvements to The Collegian designed to make it a better experience for you as readers. For the next few weeks, though, we'll be taking time off along with the rest of the student body. As is the case, we'd like to offer some pointers for winter break.

First off, before you get out of here, don't forget about your finals. This last week is important, as some classes place a huge percentage of the final grade on the last exam. Don't blow them off, and remember to be considerate of your neighbors, particularly in the dorms. Just because you might not have a final next Wednesday doesn't mean the person next door won't have to get up for an exam at 8 a.m.

Once all the exams, papers, and presentations are over, have a safe trip home, whether it's just down the Pioneer Valley or back to the West Coast. Enjoy the holidays, whichever ones you choose to celebrate, and enjoy seeing your family again. Remember, some of you haven't been home since Labor Day Weekend.

Take it easy over break. It's always good to stay busy, but this is your break. If you have a job to go back to, it's a good idea to earn some money in preparation for next semester. That way you won't have to burn $5 off your roommate just so you can order Wings. If you haven't caught up with high school friends in a while, give them a call. You'll be surprised, but they're probably thinking of doing the same thing; you just ended up making the first move. If you're fortunate enough to take a vacation to warmer confines, enjoy it while it lasts, and be prepared to have your friends be jealous when you return.

For the freshmen, remember that this was only the first semester. Look at the things you did right and continue that pattern. Evaluate what went wrong and how you can make your life better this spring. Seniors, this will truly be your last break from anything, so take full advantage of it and come back ready to do everything you want in the next few months, because they're all you have left.

The Collegian wishes all a safe and happy break and looks forward to rejoining you in January.

Feeling that gingerbread feeling

MCKENDRY

Macaulay Culkin will always be associated with Christmas. No matter what other films or plans he'll career both past and future, he'll always be first thought of as Kevin McCallister the kid from Home Alone. Truthfully, there could be worse things to be linked with. Home Alone still ranks as the highest grossing comedy of all time and for millions of young adults in their early 20s, as great memories of Christmases past.

I still remember going to the showcase Cinemas in Lawrence with my fifth-grade friends for Jacob Paul's 11th birthday party. We waited in the lobby of the theatre for 90 minutes in a crowd packed like a standing room only section at a rock concert. Amazingly, we found half a dozen seats reasonably close to each other to sit back and enjoy John Hughes' masterpiece.

Twelve years later, I still remember the experience better than any other movie I saw in my pre-junior high years. Part of this surely can be attributed to the pandemonium that filled the theatre. Just as great a part, though, belongs to the film itself. As a 10 year-old kid, the fun of Home Alone and it's sequel Home Alone 2: Lost In New York (am non-Macaulay Culkin movie in the series don't count) was in the adventures that Kevin had getting to be on his own, while at the same time foiling the plots of two moronic burglars.

As college students we all have become used to being on our own. After all, isn't that part of why we are at college, to grow up and finally become adults. Even though seeing an eight year-old checking out at the grocery store is still cute, the fact that we've spent more than our fair share of time at the Big Y makes the scene lose some of its appeal. Why then does the movie still hold a dear place in the hearts of young and old?

At the end of each film, once the bad guys are safely in the custody of the local authorities Kevin is finally reunited with his mother and then the rest of his family. Those that he couldn't wait to escape at the beginning of the movie are now all he needs for a joyous holiday. Kevin also brought joy back to a new found friend, whether it is Old Man Marley or the Central Park Pigeon Lady, reminding them that it is always better to have company than to be alone.

Somewhere In My Memory, the John Williams theme to both movies, is a song reminding us to recall holiday gatherings of the past, when we were all together amongst our family for the most festive time of the year. Darlene Love's "All Alone on Christmas" is used in the sequel and appeals to our desire for the simple not that is companionship during the holidays. "I'm all grown up but I'm the same you'll see / I'm writing you this letter 'cause I still believe / Dear Santa I've been good this year / Can I see you stay a little while with me right here." In each song, loneliness is what is to be avoided at all costs, invoking images of when Christmas as a kid used to be spent together with family.

It's difficult to put one's focus on the holidays at this time of year in college. The hell week of finals is about to begin, and if you've been lucky enough to avoid exams, I'm sure you have a four-hour presentation or a paper the size of "Crime and Punishment" due before you flee Amherst. What joy can be derived from such stress? As independent adults now, many students will be spending the winter break living in their apartments here in the Valley. Most don't have classes to take, they'd just rather not be home. It seems at times that we feel we've outgrown holidays at home.

> "It seems at times that we feel we've outgrown holidays at home."

And on the surface, it could be the case. Much like Kevin and the youthful thrill of sledding down the stairs in his home, the thrill of Christmas as youngsters was the presents. Honestly, what child does not love the feeling of waking up at three in the morning on Dec. 25, racing downstairs, grabbing their stocking on the way, and stopping in their tracks at the glorious site of the tree and gifts. Most of us now pick out the presents we want our mom and dad to wrap for Santa. Sure the action of tearing wrapping paper of the box is fun, but the magic just isn't the same.

We must look at what the holidays are truly about, a time to get together with those we love. The jubilation that we experienced opening up that brand new GI Joe or Barbie Doll as kids has been transformed into the warm feelings that fill us throughout the holidays. When we appreciate what Christmas and the yuletide season actually mean, the magic of the season returns.

When I leave Amherst next Thursday, I'll be spending the following five days at the mall with my friends. Even though closing a store on Christmas Eve seems like a chore, there is no place I'd rather be. Honest to God, people are different at Christmas time and it is a beautiful sight. When I arrive home around 8 p.m., I'll spend the rest of the evening at home with my family, listening to some carols or watching specials on television together. The next day will be spent with my extended family and all the merriment that accompanies such a gathering.

Sure the opening of presents has lost some of its importance, but the day has not. Much like Kevin McCallister learned that all he really needed for the perfect holiday was not to be alone, but rather to have his family near, we've all learned that the day is not about the presents under the tree, it's about those we care about and getting to spend some rare and valuable time together.

I wish everyone the happiest holiday season, and urge you to remember, in the words of John Williams, that Christmas is "all about family, all here with me."

Your move, Mr. Bush

MUNAYYER

Security officials in Washington will be getting their dictionaries out soon and for once it won't be for something George Bush said for meant to say. Actually, they will be a lot of translating going on because Saddam Hussein has thrown a wrench into the Bush war machine. Last week, a deadline approached for Saddam to turn in a detailed record of all weapons programs and activities that he had ordered or arranged. Well, he did. In fact, he did so a day early. President Bush and his administration had been saying that the deadline is very important and that being late could be a cause for war.

Saddam wasn't going to take any chances, not now that he knows President Bush is anxiously waiting for him to screw up, so he made sure that the report was in a day early, just in case the deadline was by American time instead of Iraqi time). And it would be hard to say that anything was left out of this report. I'm sure the 12,000-page document records every little thing one could ever want or need to know about Iraqi weapons or weapons programs.

However, Washington wasn't prepared for Saddam's cooperation. Mr. Bush needs a reason to go to war and Saddam's cooperation isn't helping. So we slowly began to see how Saddam's human rights record came into play. The administration never used this argument for war but it has surfaced with help from the British. A British investigative team compiled a report about Saddam's human rights record and released it last week. What impeccable timing. Just as the world had begun to think that maybe there is a peaceful solution to this problem and that Saddam might be able to cooperate, this news report about human rights abuses is all over the place.

Saddam does not have a good human rights record. In fact, he has a terrible one, but I don't think we needed the British to tell us this. Just as if we didn't know it already. The timing of this report, which I'm sure most concluded was mush before its release came just as Saddam was letting inspectors into palaces and sites with no restriction. So why does this work in the favor of hawkish U.S. administrators? It helps them persuade the public that even if Saddam cooperates he still needs to be eliminated. The fact that it's coming from the British, the jolly tea-guzzling ragabongs of the conflict, allows the U.S. to show others that they are not the only ones concerned about Saddam, while at the same time they will not have to emphasize human rights as a problem.

You see the United States would never want to argue human rights as a reason to go to war. This country makes way too much money in trading with nations whose human rights records are just as bad if not worse than Saddam's. For the U.S. to begin policing human rights would mean it would have to start condemning China and other nations vital to our economy, and that would be contrary to our national interest.

So where do we go from here? Well, for the Bush administration, they will probably continue to say that Iraq is a threat to the U.S. They will probably look at this document, realize they already knew about Saddam's weapons program because the U.S. was an integral player in supporting and supplying them a decade ago, and call most of the document a lie. But first the document will have to be translated into English.

Many parts of the 12,000 pages are in Arabic. Translators will have to be employed so that we can read the document in English, and even when it will be as translated from Arabic – it won't really be in English. It will most likely be filled with more technical mumbo jumbo than any educated State Department official will be able to comprehend on his/her own.

We will need to bring scientists in to explain some of the difficult terminology. And when the national security advisors finally understand what it means, they will have to dumb it down just a bit further so even President Bush can figure it out. By that time his term might be over. Yet giving President Bush (a Yale "alumnus and" man, of course) the benefit of the doubt, he should probably have some sort of response for this by January at the earliest.

You might be thinking that that isn't a long time, but as Security expert and Five College Professor Michael Klare has told me, the ideal time for a war in Iraq is between Thanksgiving and Valentine's Day. And since Christmas is coming and the goose is getting fat, President Bush is running out of time.

The bottom line is Mr. Bush has to make a decision and make one quick if he wants to get his war on. If Saddam succeeds at getting through this vital period, it might make the nation look inward to the status of the economy and find out why the secretary of the treasury resigned. The first Bush lost power because President Clinton was able to turn the country's attention inward at the dismal economy and the grossly high military budget. Unless "Dubya" gets his act together quick, Saddam might survive yet another Bush.

Holidays at home with the family

MCCARTHY

It has come to that time again, the end of a semester at school. With the conclusion of classes approaching, you can't wait to get out of here. You've had a good time, but it's time for a change. You're ready to go home or where ever you may be traveling to for your break.

Fall semester starts out really warm and then winter just comes out of its hibernation days. You have mastered the art of layering clothes that is, which wears necessary pieces in 30 degree weather and 80 inside the classroom. You have put up with living in a cell-like room long enough and are ready to go back to a more spacious, comfortable means of living for a while.

Although you will miss the friends that you have seen everyday for the past four months, you are anxious to go back home and catch up with familiar faces and hometown friends. The stress that weighs on you during final exam weeks is the killer, the ultimate reason for wanting to get out of here. Finally, it hits you, the holidays are here as well.

Home for the holidays. It is the only place to be at this time of year. Driving around a familiar town seeing Christmas trees in the windows with their twinkling lights is such a reassuring feeling. Everyone seems to be more friendly and considerate this time of year. People tend to care about others just a little bit more. Christmas casts a spell on people making them merrier than usual. I guess that is why they call it the Christmas spirit.

I love walking into my house at this time of year. My mom has it decorated so perfectly that every room you walk into has its own way of screaming out "Merry Christmas," while at the same time it's not overwhelming or obnoxious it – just right. You can even smell Christmas. Whether it is the aroma of cinnamon, logs burning in the fireplace, cookies or apple pie baking in the oven, or, of course, a Christmas tree, those smells always trigger happiness inside of me.

For me, Christmas is the time of year when I get together with all of my family. Everyone gets dressed up and eats good food and exchanges presents. I always look forward to it. I have always enjoyed sharing time with my family and am grateful for it. Having a large family at parties is so much fun. We all get together and share in the good times with laughter, music, food and drink. Seeing all the people that are special to me under one roof gives me an overwhelming feeling of joy. I walk around to every room and there is someone who loves me that I love back and we are all together again.

I see my grandparents whom I have always had a special connection with because I admire them in a different way. As whole life, my grandparents have been people who would give me anything in the world because they look at me and see a beautiful person who is going to be successful in life. Grandparents are funny like that: just about everything you do they are proud of. How can I not love them to death?

I have aunts and uncles up the wazoo and all of them are special to me for different reasons. Seeing the little cousins growing up, or realizing the older cousins have grown up and are making something of themselves is also a satisfying feeling. Since I have a big family, we are often split up throughout the year. It is Christmas that brings us all together. At a time of year when it is blistery cold outside, I seem to forget about the weather when we are all together because there is so much warmth and joy being inside with my family.

> "It seems like Christmas casts a spell on people making them merrier than usual."

Every Christmas morning holds the same tradition in my house. The rule is that no one can go downstairs until everyone is awake so that we can all walk downstairs together and feast our eyes at the glorious gifts that disguise the wooden floor we are used to stepping on. We definitely weren't spoiled kids and usually didn't complain that we didn't get much throughout the year because we knew that the only other time we got gifts were on our birthdays or by earning them, such as getting an 'A' on a report card. So when we saw just about everything we had asked for throughout the year in one pile on the floor, it was the most exciting moment of our lives.

Santa was the man. He always ate the cookies and drank the milk we left for him. Somehow, without waking us up, he also went back up the chimney onto the roof and fed just one of his reindeer the carrot we left and then came back down and left the remnants of the part he didn't eat. I guess Santa just didn't want to throw the scraps on the roof of our house and felt it nicer to leave it on the plate. Boy, he sure was a nice guy.

Time changes things and now my mom actually asks us what we want her to get us for Christmas. What happened to the magic of Santa? I guess parents just get tired of the act after 20 years. Although the magic of Santa may get lost for us adults in the hustle of the holiday season, there definitely is a magic about Christmas time. I cannot pinpoint exactly what it is or how it happens but it just does. I believe Christmas is about love and the love you share with your family and friends that you keep close at heart. It is a time to look back on the year and feel as if you have accomplished something. It is the time to reach out and touch those not as lucky, or as fortunate as you.

I remember when I was younger I used to hate when the last relative in the house would say their goodbyes and give out their kisses before the door closed behind them. It meant that the party was over, that Christmas was over. "How many days 'till the next Christmas," I would ask my mom as she began the big clean up. "Three hundred and sixty-four," she would say. My response would always be, "Three hundred and sixty-four! That's way too long!"

Ten most annoying 'Real World' stars

LIZZY NIELSEN

I figured I should get one more of these in before we all dust off our books and start trying to figure out what's gone on in our classes since early October, as obviously that was the last time you attended class. As expected, "The Real World: Las Vegas" is continuing to break all records for biggest waste of time on TV. Regardless, one of the most annoying characters in "Real World" history has emerged from the elephant excrement that is "Real World VII." Quite possibly the dumbest and most annoying TV character of all time is the stacked Vegas skank, Trishelle. This leads me to my final column of the semester, the top 10 most annoying "Real World" characters of all time.

Number 10: Cara, "Real World: Chicago"
Some may argue that there is no way Cara should make this list. I would argue that these people should remove their heads from their rectum. Watching the last few weeks of the show, there wasn't a single moment that I didn't want Tonya to snap and punch Cara across the nose. Between her unadmitted obsession with Kyle, the way she stabbed Kerri in the back, and her atrocious and overly nasal singing, Cara is awarded number 10 on the list of all-time "Real World" characters who should be hit by a bus.

Number 9: Amaya, "Real World: Hawaii"
Hawaii was the most annoying season of all time. There were so many characters worthy of being called annoying, and definitely one other will show up on this list. Girls like Amaya are the reasons that guys think girls are overemotional and dumb. The way Amaya handled the Colin situation and treated us to some kind of crying fest in every single episode was tiresome and stupid, and that ridiculously annoying sixth grader-esque behavior earns Amaya a coveted spot on the list of the most annoying "Real World" cast members.

Number 8: David, "Real World: New Orleans"
"WOO WOO!! WOO WOO!!" If these words exited David's big and obnoxious mouth one more time during the New Orleans season, I was going to write Bunim and Murray Productions a letter about how they need to stop putting these ridiculously annoying people on national television and start smacking them off the side of the head when they come in to audition. David was so unbelievably obnoxious to everyone else living in the Belfort Mansion about everything from race to "his" music, that he earns the honors of being the eighth most annoying "Real World" cast member ever.

Number 7: Beth, "Real World vs. Road Rules Challenge"
I'm not exactly sure which season Beth was on the "Real World," but she earns her spot for her performance on the first challenge between the two casts. As I recall, she over-dramatized her barely sprained ankle as an excuse to not go bungee jumping. This ended up costing the "Real World" cast this particular event. Stop your whining, Blondie. You bring shame to the rest of the flaxen-haired Elizabeths of the world. If you can't take the heat, get out of the kitchen, and if a little sprained ankle is going to stop you from helping your team, try something a little less strenuous, like knitting or cooking.

Number 6: Montana, "Real World: Boston"
Beth's partner in crime from that challenge and "Real World: Boston," ice princess Montana is much deserving of a spot on my list of jackasses who should be left in the middle of Antarctica for death. When she was on "Real World," she did little else but make an ass out of herself and commit stupid acts such as give wine to little kids and proceed to get into hot water at her job. Not only did she get fired (obviously), she then proceeded to complain about it in seemingly every scene on the show. If there's anything worse than stupidity, it's excessive and moronic complaining about something one did that was completely boneheaded (like give wine to little kids). She also pulled a Beth and refused to go bungee jumping on the challenge against "Road Rules" that she was involved in.

Number 5: Lori, "Real World: New York"
The entire female contingent of the New York cast was unbelievably annoying throughout the entire season. Two members will be highlighted in this column, the first being Lori. Has anyone ever seen Lori's real face? More often than not, she had more make-up on her face than Zsa Zsa Gabor. For the first three months, all Lori did was swoon over Kevin, and lament over how she'll never be able to have him and all kinds of other disgusting lovelorn crap. For the remainder of the time Lori spent in New York, she perfected the art of dressing up like a Vegas prostitute and went out and tried to hook random men. She would have fit in real well with the Las Vegas cast.

Number 4: Nicole, "Real World: New York"
Gotta have Nicole. On top of the fact that she, like Lori, didn't look like she had a real face because it was covered in some kind of acrylic paint all the time, she was constantly making race an issue in the house, and wouldn't date a guy because he had voted for George W. Bush. Regardless of one's feelings about GW, I'm not sure that's a reason not to date someone, but we'll give her the benefit of the doubt. Until she brings Snoop-Dogg's twin brother Bobby to the Hamptons for the weekend with the rest of the cast, only to see that feminist Nicole prefers men that order her around. Interesting, as she claims to be this fiercely independent woman, she lets a man order her around into making breakfast and a slew of other activities. Way to be a hypocrite, Nicole. And for the love of God, learn how to put on makeup.

Number 3: Kaia/Justin (tie), "Real World: Hawaii"
Hawaii was another cast full of disgustingly aggravating girls. Kaia was just one of those annoyingly deep people that you'd constantly want to punch in the gut. She'd see some kind of deepness in a bowl of Alpha Bits. She hooks up with Ruthie, the alcoholic lesbian with a girlfriend. At some point she stops speaking to Ruthie. Then, at the end of her tenure in Hawaii, she decides that she wants to get all up in Matt's junk, and consequently creates a whole slew of other problems. Justin was just the annoying Ivy League kid. That's reason enough for him to be irritating. Not to mention the fact that he alienated the entire house and decided to pick up and leave when nobody wanted to give him the time of day. Good work, Slim Shady, and blonde hair definitely does not work on someone like you.

Number 2: Tonya, "Real World: Chicago"
Let me just come out and say the fact that Tonya broke up with Justin is very admirable, and the show probably did her some good as she got to see what an aggravating, human trash waste of life that she was. During her tenure in Chicago, Tonya did a few things. Cry, talk on the phone to her safety blanket boyfriend, and yell at everyone and throw things when she got mad. Not to mention her silicone enhanced rack, fake blonde hair, and orange tan. Reminds me of some of the creatures that crawl out of Southwest.

Number 1: Trishelle, "Real World: Las Vegas"
Anyone who has read anything that I have ever written before knows my feelings regarding this season of "Real World." Trishelle is the most aggravating character on the show. There's something extraordinarily grating about women who up the pitch of their voice when they speak the end of a sentence. It makes them sound dumb as a brick. She's so unbelievably brainless and dim-witted, and by listening to the sound of her voice on Tuesday nights, I think my IQ has dropped significantly.

So there you have it, the most annoying characters to ever grace the inside of the beautiful "Real World" homes. The casting directors of the "Real World" definitely know what they're looking for when they need to find characters that have roughly the IQ of a pack of gum, but what kind of fun would the show be without the irritatingly stupid contingent.

Slick David releases solid sophomore LP

By Johnny Donaldson

CRAIG DAVID
Slicker Than Your Average
Windstar/Atlantic

Britain has never been known for its hip-hop and R&B exports. When Craig David burst onto the music scene in his own country and immediately catapulted to the top of the charts, all eyes focused upon him as the Next Big Hope when it came to hopping the pond. His signature style, called two-step or UK garage, employed rhythmic, staccato techno beats entwined with smooth R&B and became an instant sensation all around the world.

When David came to America in July 2001, music historians waited to see if the much-hyped Brit heartthrob could translate here. Elton John sang his praises, and David had the scrubbed, inoffensive good looks of a born Teen Beat idol. But England, while good at supplying us with long lasting rock superstars, has repeatedly failed to provide a viable R&B star (does anyone remember Seal?).

"Fill Me In," the stuttering, shimmering first single off his debut Born To Do It, climbed to the American Billboard Top 10 as did follow-ups "7 Days" and "Walking Away." Worldwide Born To Do It went seven times platinum, selling 1.5 million units in the United States alone.

David is now attempting to follow through on his initial success with Slicker Than Your Average, which steps away from jumpy two-step to more traditional R&B.

Right away, David wants to let us know how much pressure he faces being famous. On the title track he moans, "Ever since I stepped up/ they thought I wasn't good enough no/ they told me I would last only one song" – later on, on "Rise and Fall" he sighs, "I never used to be a troublemaker/ now I don't even wanna please the fans/ no autographs, no interviews, no pictures/ endless demands." It may be too early for a 21-year-old pop star with only one hit album to start distressing about the downsides of fame. When he sings about the pitfalls of being a superstar, David sounds whiny and just a little diva-like. It doesn't help that Slicker Than Your Average has such a weak Michael Jackson-esque atmosphere.

David has received a lot of negative press for not being dangerous enough, for being too bland. David seethes against those doubting his street cred on Slicker Than Your Average, and he tries to look dangerous on tracks like the piston-chugging "Fast Cars" which opens with the sound of glass breaking and a stolen car peeling out. But David will always be the nice boy, the R&B heartthrob you can take home to your mother ("We're sitting having dinner at your parents' home/ some of the finest food I've ever known" he sings.) David keeps it more real than most of the poseur thugs by remaining to his softie roots.

Slicker Than Your Average doesn't expand much sonically, but the percussive Timbaland inspired beats do have a slinky groove. Impressive were the sliding, purring rhythm of "Fast Cars" that melt into the happy tropical twang of "Hidden Agenda." "Rise and Fall," a luscious duet with Sting, may suffer from self-pitying lyrics, but I liked the way their voices wash into each other.

David's voice is still lithe and smooth, easily laying over the wiry groove on tracks such as the flamenco-stringed "Spanish" and the jittery "2 Steps Back." Alas, not all is successful. The single, "What's Your Flava?" has a sixth grade lacking the appeal of "Fill Me In," while "Personal" runs on to many lowerman fumes. Usher guests on "You Don't Miss Your Water ('Til the Well Runs Dry)" – no, it isn't Usher, it's Babyface, no, wait, it's really Brian McKnight. Actually, it's really just David still, and that demonstrates the sheer formula of the song.

Sleek, frosting, definitely slicker than the average, Craig David's Slicker Than Your Average is a sweet, solid, if uninspiring album. David definitely has the chops to make it in the States, and it's nice to see that he is willing to hone his craft to have continued success.

BRITAIN'S CRAIG DAVID FIRST HIT IT BIG IN THE STATES WITH LAST YEAR'S Born To Do It AND NOW IT'S BACK WITH Slicker Than Your Average.

Top 20 videogames of the year

By Reid Davenport
COLLEGIAN STAFF

20. X-Box Live Accessory – It's no video game, but with it you can tell other players you face on X-Box Online how badly you just beat them.

19. Contra: Shattered Soldier – An excellent game visually and control wise, but a bit too challenging for the average gamer. It could be enjoyed by those who like a challenge.

18. Rocky – The Italian Stallion finally hits the video game market, but it leaves a longing for a round of Mike Tyson's Punch-Out.

17. Au the Ltd Collection – Not a visual art piece, but it has an awesome story with excellent game play to boot. Role playing fans will not be disappointed with this set of four games in one package.

16. Metal Gear Solid 2: Sustenance – An X-Box exclusive game with the extras from the original version of MGS2 being enough of a reason to beg Santa to put this one under your tree.

15. MLB Slugfest 2003 – Never will you find a more entertaining baseball game than this one. Charge the mound, beat up the guy who stole second, and knock Jason Giambi in the head with a 100 mph fast ball. It doesn't get any better than that.

14. Madden 2003 – Greatest NFL game on the market, but the downside is you have to listen to chubby old Madden spew out obvious comments like, "In order to win you need to play good offense." Thanks Captain Obvious.

13. Tom Clancy's Splinter Cell – A very unique looking spy-shooter that will entrap gamers in its rich graphics and detailed movements.

12. Star Wars: Bounty Hunter – Hunt down the scum of the universe with Jango Fett and even fly with his cool little jet pack. A little less jerky movement would be nice though.

11. Dead to Rights – Use your enemies as weapons or human shields. This game is all that and a body bag. Don't try the moves at home kids. The moves are done by trained computer generated video game characters.

10. WWF Smackdown!: Shut Your Mouth – Wrestling could only be more entertaining if it involved Jell-O. This game brings sound, graphics, chairs, and sweat tights to the table.

9. Lord of the Rings: The Two Towers – Put it this way, the cast of the movie wouldn't put their controllers down to even wipe the drool from their mouths while testing the game. Make this game your "precious."

8. Hitman 2 – If sneaking around, knocking out peeing body guards, and stealing their clothing sounds like fun then this game will fit your odd tastes. The sequel to the popular PC game is graphically tantalizing and the style of play is one of the most unique in the gaming world to date.

7. Dragon Ball Z: Budokai – The first serious DBZ game for American fans of the popular cartoon series. Excellent graphics and character selection will leave even the casual fan placing this one on their wish list.

6. Mortal Kombat: Deadly Alliance – More blood and gore than ever before. This latest installment of the MK series will have you chopping off your friends heads in no time. Well, in the game and not real life of course.

5. Tekken 4 – Possibly the biggest fighting game released this year. Stunning 3D graphics and easy to handle game play will have your family gather around your TV instead of opening presents.

4. The Thing – The only game that can scare you more than kissing your grandmother at Christmas dinner. With a unique squad system and terrifying creatures crawling at you, this one will make you wonder if Grandpa has hairy ears or got infected with the virus.

3. Resident Evil 0 – A GameCube exclusive that blows its other Resident Evil counterparts away. A prequel story to the original with creepy new monsters has parents rushing to the store for it before they sell out.

2. Grand Theft Auto: Vice City – A PS2 exclusive that goes far beyond GTA3. Buy up land, fly a helicopter, and steal cars. What a way to spend the holidays.

1. Metroid Prime – The long awaited sequel has finally arrived on GameCube exclusively. The amazing 3D worlds, weapon arsenal, and control will have every boy and girl wasting Christmas day away staring at the TV.

Dishonorable Mentions

Legends of Wrestling 2 – Even more disappointing than the first. Wait until the price drops to $20 then ask for it as a stocking stuffer next year or wager it when you're spinning a dreidel.

The Lord of the Rings: Fellowship of the Ring – Nice graphics, poor game play. I'd rather play pong on Atari. There, I said it.

Army Men: Green Rouge – A good game to buy for the person you hate the most in the entire world. I spent $4 renting this game and I'm still awaiting my refund from the company that created such a horribly created game.

Bands on the verge of breaking out

By Mike Barrett
Collegian Staff

Who are you kidding? 2002 is practically over, so it's time to peer in our crystal ball and look ahead. What bands are on the cusp of breaking out? Here are my top five predictions.

5 Bucket Full of Teeth This may be a one-off hardcore supergroup or it may be something bigger. Featuring members of the late Orchid, Wolves and Cancer Kids, this band announced Youth Attack Records is simultaneously release an album's worth of material as three separate 7" EPs. They had a short Northeast tour in Aug., and a compiled CD of the three EPs is in the works. So far, they've managed to gain as much as head in hearing range, just to make their label go broke.

4 Sonic Youth They may be the grunge-rock elder gave, but this past year's album Sonic Youth pitching the sweet-ta mature to rock attitude they developed over the past few years and embraced a return to form. The group's album from this past summer, Murray Street, dropped all the Cage influenced serial cerealism of 1000 Leaves and NYC Ghosts And Flowers and in its place was a rocker the likes not seen since Dirty back in '92. This still kept out foot in the pregnant with lots of spacious guitar scapes and pseudo-Krautrock minimalism, but in all that glitters beauts was the rock that every 90s alterna-teen grew up worshipping. Let's see if they can release a follow up this summer, maybe a reissue of the "4 Tunna Box" EP? That may be a sam request, though.

3 Landing Another band that isn't exactly new. Based out of Conn., this four-piece has made a serious splash in the space-rock scene and is drawing over to turn heads every where else they play. The group's albums and EPs glitter and shine with a beauty as yet unheard in music, and they're now following a beat either they managed to release three separate CD- this summer alone. Five Landing will thier you. Not with power as volume, but simply with something as beautiful and essential, it's like a lost part of void and soul mate found an autumn afternoon in the sun. Sometimes words fail...implicitly, but try to remember your first rainbow.

2 The DIA OK, not actually a band, but a new hope to be geeks mixed with indie music. Formed by Jim Goldsworthy (CNN, LT.) and James Murphy (speedkng), this label is single handedly defining the most electro-clash (an No Home, Nu Wave or whatever you may call it) movement. With a powerhouse roster featuring bands like The Rapture, LCD Soundsystem, The Juan Maclean and Black Dice, it's not hard to see why. Most of their releases have only been 12" dance singles (NOW that's 80s, man) and have managed to take over the New York club scene and rock the decks at UMass. WMUA for an entire semester. But don't worry children of the digital generation; a CD comp of all these tunes is slated for a near release!

1 Lightning Bolt Simply put, this band is blowin' the "I" up. Lightning Bolt are possibly the best thing to happen to rock music since Elvis. A bass and drum duo based out of Providence, R.I., the group has two albums, a couple of 7" singles and a ton of compilation tracks out- mostly on the R.I. label Load. Formed sometime around 1994, this band has gone through a number of line-ups and a couple of break-ups to finally break out into the national scene. They don't need stages or stinking guitars - just drums, bass and a pile of amps that would make Pete Townsend blush. Their live shows are not to be missed, loud as the devil and set up on the floor, these boys take punk in directions that no one can expect, and that's a big fresh breath of air. Last month in Providence they played after Sonic Youth. At the Palladium in Worcester this past July, exercising cleated out after their set, before the Locust could even get near the stage. Not an act to try to follow, no siree!

Colleges offer massages, naps and healthy treats for stressed-out students

MILWAUKEE (AP) — Naptime, calming music and free massages — it must be finals week.

Seeking to ease the stress caused by late-night studying and endless pots of coffee, colleges from Buffalo, N.Y., to Lawrence, Kan., are turning to massages, meditation and a break from the books to ease student worries.

At a "stress-free zone" Wednesday at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, students took naps, drank water and ate healthy snacks while enjoying free massages from licensed therapists.

"A lot of it is just to remind students to take care of themselves during finals week. Sleep and eating are often neglected during that time," said Rob Sepich, a stress management counselor at the UW.

At Marian College in Fond du Lac, smiley faces advertised three campus areas designated as stress-free zones — a regression session with Play-doh, animal cookies, punch and finger painting; a relaxation area with massages, candles, low lighting and guided meditation; and a coffee house featuring karaoke, coffee, hot chocolate and games.

Student associations at the universities of Buffalo and Kansas are offering free massages, goodies, giveaways and aromatherapy candles. Kansas also had a screening of Lord of the Rings: The Fellowship of the Ring.

While it may seem extravagant to older generations, students these days face added pressures such as jobs and extracurricular activities, said Kerry Struppp, the school's director of campus life.

"I don't think they really understand how much more pressures are on our students these days," she said.

Nearly a dozen bodies were sprawled on mats in a dimly lit room with calming music at UW-Milwaukee on Tuesday as a nurse guided them through a meditation exercise. It was so relaxing that biochemistry student Iyad Alaqa, 28, started snoring.

"I didn't sleep for the past 32 hours," he said later. "You just need to give your brain a break."

At Marquette University in Milwaukee, students are getting more study space with free coffee and doughnuts, a spokeswoman said. New-age strains soothe the senses in the student union, where a pianist plays daily at noon during finals.

Sepich admits the massages and aromatherapy aren't really necessary for academic success, but they help. Mostly, he said, getting some sleep, eating properly and cutting back on stimulants is key.

Cutting out caffeine during finals?

"If your hands are so jittery you can't fill in the ovals, that wouldn't be good," Sepich said.

Figuring out the next Heisman winner

As the college football season winds down, the excitement only starts to build. With bowl games just around the corner, the NCAA will be passing out way too many postseason awards. Everyone from the nation's best defensive player to most valuable towel boy will be awarded. However, there is one award that still catches the nation's eye – the Heisman Trophy.

Since Jay Berwanger won the first Heisman back in 1935, the award has stood as the pinnacle of a college football player's career. Looking over the history of the award, this could be the most open and exciting Heisman race in history.

Normally there are two players who are the favorites, but this year four out of the five invited candidates are truly in the run. The exception is Miami quarterback Ken Dorsey, who has no business being there.

The five finalists for this season's Heisman Trophy are Penn State halfback Larry Johnson, USC quarterback Carson Palmer, Iowa quarterback Brad Banks, and Miami teammates, halfback Willis McGahee and Dorsey. The Hurricane duo is the first set of teammates to make the bill since 1994 when Penn State sent Kerry Collins and NFL bust Ki-Jana Carter –Colorado's Rashard Salaam won the award that year. Each candidate has his own reason for making it to the ceremony and a stat that sets them apart from the other four athletes.

Brad Banks – Iowa – Quarterback

After sitting on the bench and watching Iowa finish at a mediocre 6-5 last season, Banks busted out of nowhere to lead the Hawkeyes to 11-1 (8-0 Big Ten), a number three ranking and a trip to the Orange Bowl, where he'll face fellow Heisman finalist, Carson Palmer.

With only 68 throws in his junior season, Banks showed the nation he was the complete package in his senior year at the most important position on the field – quarterback. Banks is by far the most precise, clutch passer out of the three signal-callers up for the honor. His 166.1 QB rating, second best in the nation, backs that up.

The AP Player of the Year has thrown 25 touchdowns and found the paydirt himself five times, four of the five coming in the last two games. When he's being pressured, Banks is a great scrambler with 387 yards on the ground.

As for passing yards, Dorsey (3,073) and Palmer (3,639) dominate Banks (2,369) in that category, though Banks has thrown only four interceptions, a crucial stat in his Heisman hopes. Along with the low number of picks, Banks has a 60.1 percent completion percentage.

Ken Dorsey – Miami – Quarterback

If Dorsey wins the Heisman, it will be an absolute travesty. His numbers aren't even close to Palmer or Marshall's Byron Leftwich, who wasn't invited to the Yale Club. The only reason he would win the award would be his 58-1 record as a starter for the Hurricanes, by far the most talented and powerful program for years to come.

Yes, only one loss in his career is very impressive, but the award is given out every year. It's an annual award given to the best player in the nation for the year and only that year. He's not even the best player on his team!

Dorsey's stats speak the truth better than anything could. Out of the three quarterbacks up for the award, Dorsey has the least passing yards, the worst completion percentage, only one more TB than Banks, and tied with Palmer with 10 interceptions.

The breaking point would have to be the attempted halfback pass intended for the slow-as-molasses Dorsey. When Miami's back-up halfback came in with the ball on the four-yard line, you knew that something crazy, or stupid, was about to happen. Up 28 points, Miami coach Larry Coker wanted Dorsey to earn some valuable votes, but instead, Virginia Tech's Willie Pile picked off the pass and returned it 96 yards for six points.

Besides the record, Dorsey doesn't have a single stat or performance that makes him a legitimate consideration. The NCAA is full of politics, and if Dorsey wins the award, the fix is in.

Willis McGahee – Miami – Running Back

Now, if you really know what you are talking about, you know the best player on the Miami Hurricanes is sophomore shocker Willis McGahee. Listed as a backup in the beginning of the season, McGahee was given the start in the second game against powerhouse Florida and finished with 204 yards on 24 carries (8.5 avg). There was no debate on the starter after that breakout performance.

This scoring machine was the major reason the Hurricanes remained undefeated. His 1,686 yards and 26 touchdowns are a Miami record, including a 205-yard, six-TD finale against the Hokies. His 36-point effort saved the Hurricane's undefeated season. His final game alone makes him a favorite for the award.

As a sophomore, McGahee has shown poise and maturity on and off field all season. He waits for his blockers to set up holes and then explodes through the line. In every interview about the Heisman, he picked his teammate Dorsey, as the favorite over himself. If the humble second-year sensation wins, he'll be the first sophomore to win the award.

Larry Johnson – Penn State – Running Back

If one player can be credited with bringing Penn State football back into the national spotlight, Larry Johnson is the answer. The senior captain was by far the most impressive runner in the college football in 2002. This season, Johnson became the ninth player in history of Division 1 football to gain over 2,000 yards.

11 saved his best games for last. In his second to last game, Johnson ran all over Indiana, gaining an eye-popping 327 yards with four TDs. In his final game, he had 279 yards and four TDs – in the first half. That's 606 yards and eight touchdowns in a game and a half. Clutch numbers like that towards the end of the season will also earn some valuable votes.

By the end of the season, the Nittany Lion star finished with 2,015 yards, 20 touchdowns, and an unbelievable 8.0 yards per carry. 11 didn't find the end zone in just one game this season. He was a reliable receiver out of the backfield with 19 receptions for 341 yards and five TDs. Also, he gained at least 250 yards in four games.

His stats are Heisman-worthy, but Johnson wasn't flawless. Against his three toughest opponents (Ohio State, Michigan, and Iowa), 11 wasn't able to get over the century mark in all three contests. The result all three of Penn State's losses and no Heisman.

Carson Palmer – USC – Quarterback

Carson Palmer is a very interesting story. In his first three years, Palmer was unable to reach his full potential and seemed to be playing for a new offensive coordinator every year. Then, Pete Carroll got run out of New England, which could have been the best thing to happen to Palmer in his college career.

Palmer shined under Carroll at the helm by leading USC to a top five ranking and a spot against Banks and the Hawkeyes in the Orange Bowl. He is looking to become the first West Coast player since Marcus Allen in 1981 to win the Heisman Trophy.

Palmer dominated through the air better than anyone else. His 334.4 passing yards per game was sure to catch the eye of quite a few voters. The other two QBs stats don't even come close to Palmer's numbers in passing yards (3,639), touchdowns (32), completions (268) and completion percentage (62.9).

Palmer was unstoppable in his search for the end-zone, tossing four or more touchdowns in five games, including five touchdown tosses against Oregon. The best Pac-10 quarterback threw under 200 yards only once (a loss to Kansas St.) while throwing for 300 yards or more in six games, including 425-yard and 448-yard performances.

Palmer – last game was exactly what he needed before heading into the voting. Against No. 11 Notre Dame, Palmer once again picked them apart for 425 yards and four scores. Another important game is the overtime loss against Washington State. Though his team lost in the extra frame, Palmer played well, going 32-for-50 with 381 yards and three TDs, two by air and one on the ground.

If you had to cut for a quarterback based on numbers, the Trojan Man is the only choice you can make.

Now, it's time to break it down. This is will determine who really does deserve the Heisman trophy.

First, you must have dominating numbers in major categories within your position. So Dorsey is definitely out of the running. Dorsey is a great quarterback within the Miami system, but McGahee killed his numbers this season. Bye-bye.

Second, you need to beat and play well against the best team you play during the season. This rules out Larry Johnson who choked against quality teams and tough defenses. Iowa, Michigan, and Ohio State were all able to keep Johnson contained and all three opponents won the game. Time to get ready for the pointless Capital One bowl 11.

Third and finally you have to beat out every other player nominated within your position with a combination of team success, stats and big game performances. Banks had a great season, but his stats are too weak compared to Palmer. Banks will look to prove that theory wrong at the Orange Bowl.

It's down to McGahee and Palmer. Each player deserves the award as much as the other does. Every vote is crucial this year, as one vote could be the difference between the Heisman and first loser.

Patriots battle Titans on MNF

By Tom Sharp
Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) – After early-season slides, hardly anyone believed the New England Patriots or the Tennessee Titans would get this far.

When they meet in Nashville on Monday night, both will try to stay ahead in pursuit of the NFL playoffs.

"Indy would have been the No. 1 ranked team in the AFC had the playoffs started last week, which of course means zero. But this week they wouldn't even make the playoffs," Patriots quarterback Tom Brady said. "It's just one game, but in one game you can go from the top to the bottom real quick."

Tennessee understands that, too. The Titans are the team that beat Indianapolis last week – for the second time this season – and took command of the AFC South, relegating the Colts to one of those teams still in contention, but needing help from somebody else.

"This is a big game for us," Titans quarterback Steve McNair said. "We're 8-5 and we both hold our own destiny and can go to the playoffs. That means a lot."

The Patriots, tied with the Miami Dolphins for the AFC East lead, are also 8-5. Like the Titans, the Patriots are on a roll, winning five of six; the Titans have taken seven of eight. And the quarterbacks are in high gear, although the battered McNair seems to be there only on game days.

"It's almost like he lays on his death bed all week, then gets up and goes and plays," Brady said of McNair.

McNair has had two excellent games in a row, against the Giants and the Colts, even though he didn't practice in the week before either game. He has injured ribs and turf toe.

"From my toe to my ribs, it's real sore for two days after the game," McNair said. "Then by the third day I feel a little better and get loosened up and try to move around, but for a couple of days afterward, I'm in serious pain."

He said the Patriots are especially inventive on defense.

"You might see two defensive linemen and the rest of them are linebackers and cornerbacks," McNair explained.

The Titans will also have their hands full defensively. Brady leads the league with 26 touchdown passes, and is the fourth-ranked quarterback in the AFC with a rating of 91.7.

"The quarterback is playing very well and they have a very good supporting cast," Tennessee coach Jeff Fisher said. "They're playing with a great deal of confidence."

Brady said the Patriots have been playing at a level similar to their late-season push to the Super Bowl last year.

"We really pride ourselves on finishing well. I feel comfortable late in the year, and I think everyone else does, especially when the magnitude of the games is that much more intense."

Brady said. "It really comes down to a three-game season."

While throwing the ball is the Patriots' forte, stopping the pass has not been the Titans' strong suit. Tennessee is the sixth-best team in the league in run defense, but 25th against the pass; the Patriots rank sixth in the league in passing offense.

One place the Titans have improved considerably against the pass is takeaways. Safety Lance Schulters is tied for the league lead with six interceptions, and the Titans already have picked off 15 passes this year, compared to seven all of last season.

Horoscopes

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Don't worry about those things that are out of your control; they all have a way of working out. Minimize your own errors.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You must give yourself the best possible chance today. The odds may have been against you as the day opened, but you can turn things around.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You'll realize it very quickly when a new and profitable opportunity comes your way. How soon can you free yourself up to take advantage of it?
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You'll receive some last-minute information today which may require you to change your plans and reschedule your day from top to bottom. Get to it!
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You'll very likely hear about something today that is fast approaching, and for which you must prepare with great care. Trust your instincts.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Episodes will transpire and fade into memory so quickly today that you may feel as though you're merely changing channels hour by hour.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Take care that you don't become too critical too soon. Let someone impress you with his or her ingenuity and creativity first.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You can afford to be a little different today – but make sure not to keep the change. It doesn't pay not to tip.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You have to reduce the incidence of surprise today if you are going to enjoy any real confidence or stability. Avoid outright risks.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You'll receive a surprise gift today from someone who has been looking out for you over the past several days, weeks or months. Get more info!
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You're in control, whether you know it or not. Make things clear; let others know just what your situation is and what you expect from it.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You're not going to stick to one style of behavior or presentation today; explore all manner of expression, and do what strikes your fancy.

UMass does it again

By Matthew F. Sacco
COLLEGIAN STAFF

PRINCETON, N.J. — UMass coach Don Cahoon won many games at Hobey Baker Rink during his nine years as the leader of the Princeton hockey program. Still, he can do nothing but rest his face in his cupped hands after the Minutemen barely pulled out an overtime victory over the 1-13-0 Tigers.

UMass	4
Princeton	3

Thomas Pock scored his second goal of the game at 2:37 of overtime to seal the 4-3 victory.

"I was looking for somebody in front of the net," Pock said. "I just wanted to get it to the net."

The win marks UMass' 10th of the season before Christmas, a school record.

Pock controlled the puck in the corner and with a backpack that resembled a Princeton defenseman, fired a shot off the glove of Nate Nourieland for the win.

"He showed he has great puck skills," Cahoon said of Pock. "He put on a little clinic in the last two shifts of overtime. He knows that he's truly one of the more skilled players in Hockey East."

UMass looked like it had control after Matt Anderson gave his team a 3-2 lead with just under four minutes remaining.

Stephen Werner controlled the puck at the offensive blueline before feeding Greg Mauldin who settled the puck, springing Anderson for the goal.

But when Sean Regan took a goaltender interference penalty, the Tigers capitalized. Mike Patton gained the zone down the right wing, cut back on Pock and fired a shot between Gabe Winer's legs.

The Minutemen were forced to fight tooth and nail for a game they thoroughly dominated after Princeton scored two goals in the second period to tie the game.

"The whole game I felt we were the better team," Pock said. "The puck just wasn't really going for us at times."

Moments after killing off a UMass power play, Mike Patton sprung Chris Owen on a breakaway with Gabe Winer. Owen clipped Winer's legs before sliding the puck to his backhand and scoring over the goalie's left shoulder for a 2-1 deficit.

The Tigers had a chance to tie the game after Pock took an interference penalty in the offensive zone. But Winer made two point blank stops on Owen and Patton to defend his lead.

That advantage would not last, as two more UMass penalties coincided with the end of Princeton's power play.

"At one point we were playing very well," Cahoon said. "Then we took a few penalties and we played like a young team."

The Tigers dominated the puck for almost the full two minutes of the 5-on-3 before Seamus Young's high slot wrist shot beat Winer stick side for the equalizer.

Winer did not bring his best game to Hobey Baker Rink, as he allowed two goals to beat him five-hole from sharp angles. But the rookie still managed 21 saves, including eight in each of the first two periods.

Cocaine suspected in death

A University of Massachusetts undergraduate died early last Wednesday after going into cardiac arrest and being rushed to Cooley Dickinson Hospital for a possible drug overdose.

Jessica A. Harpin, 21, of Millvile, Mass., was pronounced dead at 4:53 a.m. at the hospital in Northampton, Belchertown police authorities said.

Officer William Panto, a patrolman with the Belchertown Police Department, said that Harpin was transported from an apartment in the Cedarwood apartment complex at 122 N. Street (Route 9) in Belchertown after a 911 call was made at about 4 a.m.

"She was on the bed totally unresponsive," Panto said.

According to UMass spokesperson Barbara Pitoniak, Harpin lived off-campus in Amherst and was a member of the class of 2003. Harpin was a sociology and education major, Pitoniak said.

Panto said that there was a large block of cocaine present in plain view at the scene.

Police arrested Blake E. Harris, 25, on the scene and charged him with trafficking cocaine several hours later after obtaining a search warrant and searching the house.

Harris was held overnight in Hampshire County Jail until his arraignment last Thursday in Ware District Court.

Harpin's roommates said that she was a member Kappa Delta Pi, a teaching honors society, and found fulfillment in teaching. She taught first graders at Pelham Elementary School.

"She truly had a passion to educate others," they said in a group statement to the Collegian. "Jessica really did touch many of not only her generation, but of a younger one as well."

"Jessica radiated an energy of happiness and kindness that anyone around her could not resist," they said. "She showed us what beauty one person could have and give to the world."

The roommates, who wished to remain unidentified, said that she had a magnetic personality and a positive outlook that made any situation entertaining and fun.

"She is loved and will always be missed," they said.

Harpin was a 1999 graduate of Blackstone-Millvile Regional High School, according to Sara Withee, a reporter with the Milford Daily News, the hometown paper in Millville.

She is the second student from her high school class to die within two weeks, according to the Milford Daily News. The newspaper reported that on Jan. 10, fellow classmate Joseph Scungio Jr., a police dispatcher, was found dead in his Millville home. Scungio family members said that the 22-year-old had a heart condition and believed he had a heart attack. The 600-student high school remembered her last week as an outgoing student who also played field hockey, according to the article.

"I remember her as a terrific kid, bubbly personality, very popular," Blackstone-Millville Guidance Counselor Kevin Maloney said. "The response was all the same: that such a sweet girl came to such a tragic ending," he said.

Cadet and canine programs to start

Initiatives planned for March

By DAN LAMOTHE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Several law enforcement initiatives established at the end of last semester are now in full swing and should be implemented before the end of the semester.

According to University of Massachusetts Police Chief Barbara O'Connor, both a police cadet program and the introduction of a police dog to the force are in the beginning stages of implementation.

The hiring of Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald also bodes well for the programs, as he has said he will make them a focus of his first six months on the job as deputy chief.

Police dog on the way

According to O'Connor, a canine safety patrol is on its way some time during the spring semester as long as the dog, a mixed breed named Max from the New England Canine Academy in East Hartford, Conn., passes his training.

"It's a ten week process," O'Connor said. "He started his training on Jan. 6, so he should be here sometime after spring break if he passes his training."

O'Connor said that officer Mark Shlosser has been assigned to work with Max on the canine patrol, which is supposed to be a 7 p.m. to 3 a.m. shift. Shlosser is currently training with Max at the same academy where Max was purchased.

Once Max passes his training program, he will become an official part of UMPD and will be cared for by Shlosser during off hours.

"The use of canines is a growing trend in public safety on college campuses," O'Connor said. "In addition to aiding the investigation of crimes, they have also been shown to be an effective tool in crime prevention."

O'Connor said that the dog will be considered as a viable option for any serious crime committed on campus.

According to O'Connor, the plan as of right now is to use the dog as a patrol tracking dog. She also said that it is a possibility that Max could end up in the residence halls if a serious crime takes place there. She named sexual assault as an example of a crime where Max's capabilities could be useful.

The Student Government Association expressed concern last semester that the dog could be used for drug sniffing in random searches of residence halls.

O'Connor does not see that happening right now. "If and when we're going to use the dog in that capacity, we'll get in a room and talk about it," she said.

Cadet program planned

Police presence on campus should also be increased through the development of a cadet program on campus, according to O'Connor and Archbald.

UMPD cadets will be students from various area schools with an interest in pursuing law enforcement as a career. "They're going to be our eyes and ears on campus," Archbald said. "It's going to give us an increased sense of security, from a student's perspective."

Cadets will be clearly identifiable with navy slacks, police hat, and a gray shirt, according O'Connor, and will have limited police/arrest powers. She sees cadets on campus by sometime in March, as long as the fiscal crisis affecting the state does not affect UMPD funding.

O'Connor said that a list of about 20 students has been forwarded to the next step in them becoming cadets, which includes a background check. A training program for those chosen will begin some time in February.

"I was really pleased with the pool of applicants," O'Connor said. "It's a very

Bar on horizon for Bluewall

By MELISSA HAMMEL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Renovations have been made to the Blue Wall Coffee Shop at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center during winter break.

The project, which began in early January, will feature new flooring, additional television sets and updated furniture. There are also plans for additional entertainment to be brought in to create a student-friendly atmosphere.

Another proposed addition to the Blue Wall is a bar that would be set up to serve such beverages as beer and wine to students over the age of 21. The idea of a bar is not new for the Blue Wall. The eatery was equipped with a mini-bar and featured frequent student entertainment until the 1980s, when the feature was eliminated.

The plan to bring back the bar was organized by Student Government Association President Dave Carr. Carr said in a previous Collegian article that he hoped that the bar would bring back revenue to the University and that he was optimistic that it would be implemented.

"We're looking to make last call later than that of in town. We're still working out the minor details," Carr said. "But we're going to have a huge grand opening when it is complete."

Dan Saunders, SGA speaker also expressed his excitement at the idea of a bar.

"I'm pretty psyched. It's great to put energy towards the middle of campus," Saunders said to the Collegian. "We've still got a few issues to discuss like safety and parking, but it's exciting and great for the SGA."

The proposed bar is the third of its kind in the Campus Center. One exists in the Graduate Lounge, located directly across from the Blue Wall, and features a small bar that serves only beer and wine to students of age.

JAMES SCHAFFER/COLLEGIAN

The Bluewall underwent renovations during the winter break. Plans to impliment a bar are currently being discussed.

The second comes in the form of the top of campus bar, located on the 11th floor of the Campus Center. The space had been home to the Skybox, formerly a club that served alcohol and hosted musical acts. Most recently a bar was opened last spring. The hours were Thursday through Sunday evenings.

One of the main benefits of the bar, according to the staff, was that it was located on campus, preventing the issue of drinking and driving.

"Since the school cut the escort service, some people are afraid they'll go out to a party and not be able to get back on campus," Sam Nasratian, an employee of the Campus Center said in a previous Collegian story. "This way, people don't have to drive. It prevents a lot of drunk driving."

The alcohol abuse prevention task force, however, is still looking at the issue of a bar. The group was set up several years ago to look at trends regarding alcohol abuse.

In addition to looking at the issue of a bar in the Blue Wall, the task force also brought suggestions before the Faculty Senate late last semester regarding how to curb underage alcohol use and the abuse of alcohol.

Some of the suggestions that they came up with included the establishment of an alcohol free dormitory on campus, as well as allowing freshman students to reside in Greek sponsored housing.

The task force has been making plans to convert one of the smaller dormitories with a little over 100 beds into an alcohol free-living environment. Eventually, the body explained at the meeting, they hoped to have an alcohol free dormitory in each living area.

"There are 11,000 students on campus. We have a populous that changes by one quarter every year, bringing in new young people with their own norms and experience with alcohol," Interim Vice Chancellor and Dean of Students Jo-Ann Vanin said during the meeting. "This and the lack of a coherent first year experience contribute to problems."

The senate approved these suggestions, as well as allowing the committee to further evaluate of the effectiveness of the enforcement of drinking regulations in dormitories and current alcohol policies.

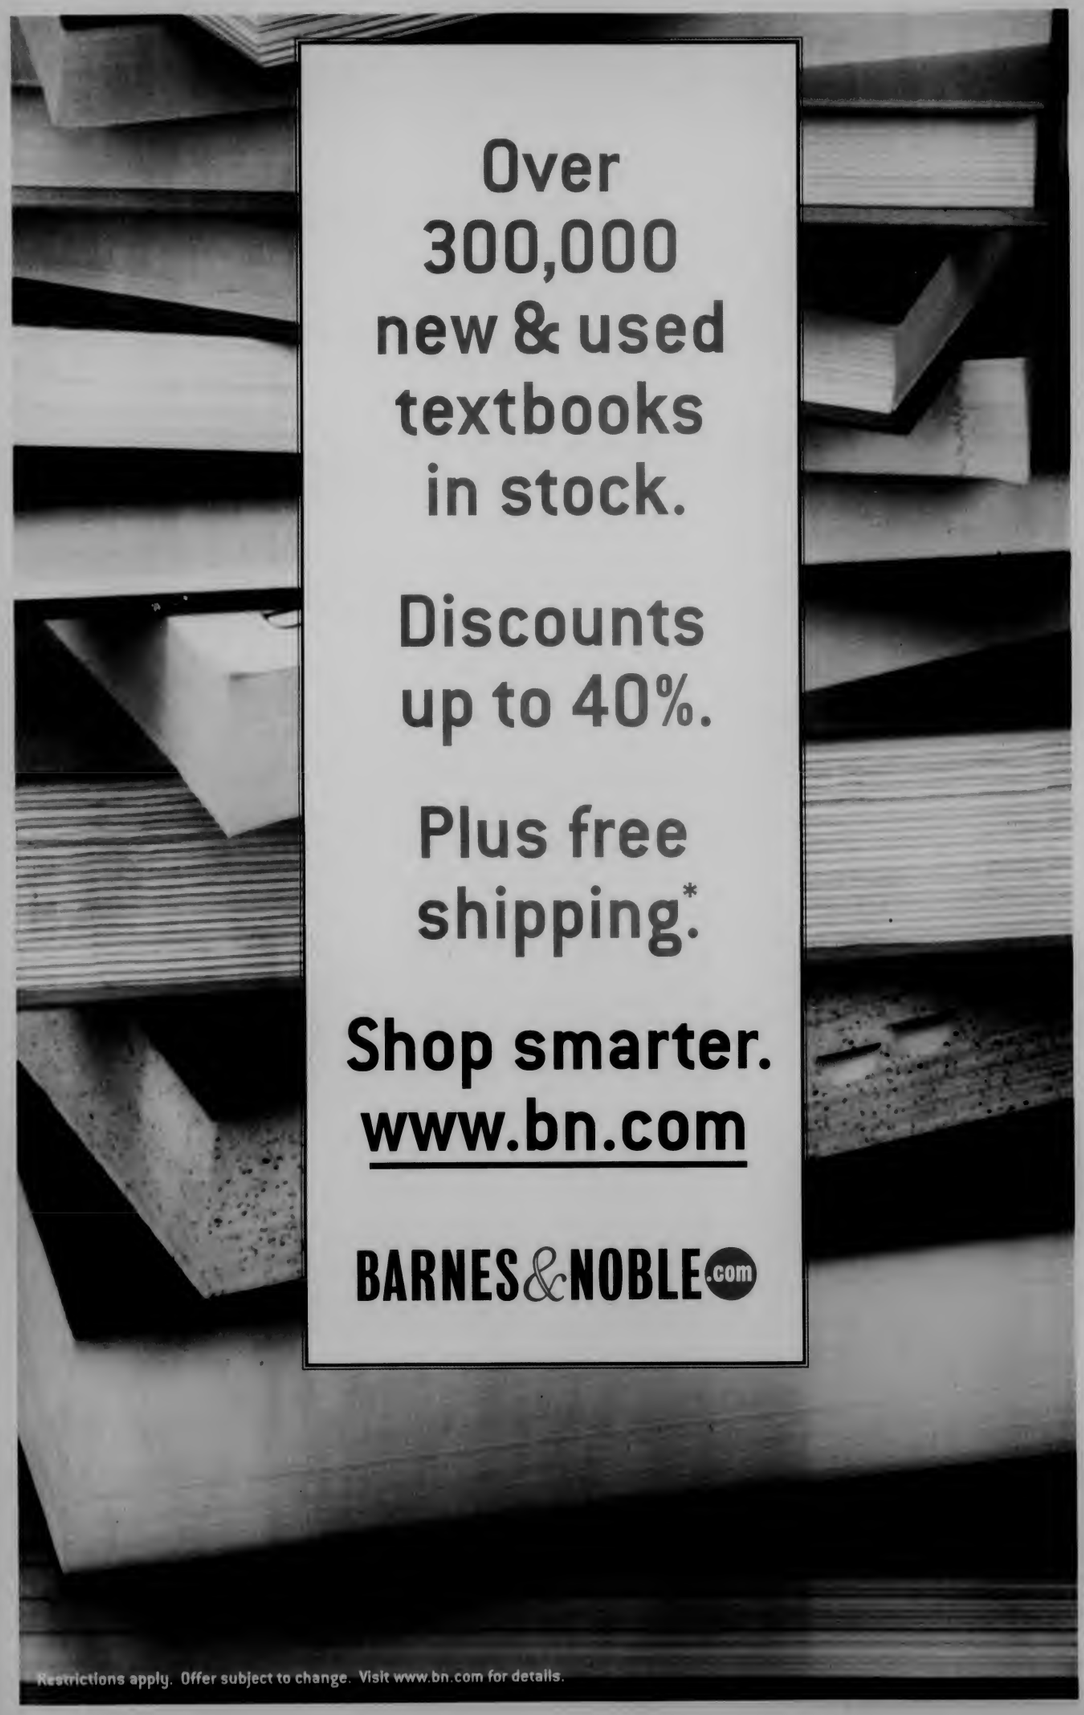
Another issue that has been addressed on campus in regards to alcohol is the issue of tailgating during sporting events. The decision as to whether or not to ban alcohol at sporting events has fluctuated throughout the years.

A ban was in place from the years of 1988-1992 but was lifted temporarily in September of 1992 on a trial basis.

The ban remained lifted until fall of 1997 when a series of incidents prompted then Chancellor David K. Scott to once again reinstate the ban on alcohol consumption.

During that year the University received a number of alcohol related complaints during Homecoming Weekend and student drinking was at the forefront as an issue that many colleges were forced to deal with.

Also that year junior Adam G. Prentice died in what was regarded as an alcohol related incident.



Prentice died in the early morning of Sept. 27, 1997 when he allegedly fell through Morrill Science Center Greenhouse and bled to death. The coroner's report indicated that Prentice was intoxicated at the time of the fall.

"I had observed that tailgating at the football game was a disaster waiting to happen... and so I have decided to discontinue the experiment where tailgating was allowed as a waiver of our policy against consumption of alcohol in open spaces," Scott said in a previous Collegian story. "This experiment has been a failure, and it will be discontinued."

Current Chancellor John Lombardi has once again temporarily lifted the ban on a trial basis in order to look at the possibility of generating revenue through tailgating.

While the Committee on Alcohol Abuse continues to look at the issue of adding a bar to the Blue Wall, the possibility of implementing alcohol free dormitories across campus continues to be a topic that is continually addressed.

Students and faculty respond to possibilty of war with Iraq

By COURTNEY CHARLES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As the United Nations deadline for the inspections announcement grows near, the conflict in Iraq hits the forefront of American and international politics. Students and staff at the University of Massachusetts offer different perspectives on the current struggle.

"I think Bush senior ran to his son now and asked him to finish what he couldn't all those years ago," Blake Kleppe, a sophomore biochemistry and molecular biology major said. "I think this is just a very expensive way to kill one man."

"They have to wait to attack Baghdad until the UN people leave," Cindy Bahcelli, a worker on Hanscom Airforce Base said. "I think there will be a war just because we need to get Saddam Hussein out of there and I don't know if any other country could handle that."

Bahcelli said that the UN inspectors will be able to determine how advanced the Iraqi technology really is.

"If their technology is better than ours, I think they would have already done something by now," Bahcelli said. "We could out fight them though. Our military is much better trained and bigger than theirs."

However, Bahcelli did say that she was fearful about the biological and chemical weapons that she says Iraq possesses.

"They have this thing that they can spray from like a mile away. It shuts down your system and your organs stop working in five minutes," Bahcelli said.

She said she was not sure whether this chemical was inhaled or was able to pass through the skin. Probably both, she said.

According to Bahcelli's estimates, the United States would probably suffer a large number of casualties in the war with Iraq.

The United States government shows no signs of backing down.

"I think that no matter what level of compliance Iraq shows it won't matter to the Bush administration," Jarret Marcoux, junior engineering major said. "It is obvious they are set on war."

The reasons the administration has for going to war are not valid, especially when contrasting the seemingly dormant situation in Iraq with the escalating crisis in North Korea, according to Marcoux.

Dave G Dubois, professor of African American studies and journalism, said that the policy makers will be responsible for making a decision about the conflicts in the Middle East.

Dubois was a 20-year resident of Egypt. He said that he knows only about the people of Egypt and Lebanon, because that is where he spent most of his time.

"In general Egyptians have great admiration for the U.S. as such and are very receptive to American people and tourists," Dubois said. "They are adamantly opposed to the U.S. government's position in regards to the Israel and Palestinian problem."

According to Dubois, as much as they know about the American media, they think that it doesn't tell the American people enough, that Americans don't know much about what is going on.

Is Saddam really as evil as the media portrays him?

"I can't answer that when taking into account how obvious it is that our news is filtered and distorted," Marcoux said. "I think the entire media is distorted. I have a problem with the U.S. not giving any supporting evidence on their accusations."

Anti war protests both in the U.S. and abroad have sparked discussion as well.

"People need to get off their behinds [in America]. They need to get in the streets to stop the war," Dubois said.

Marcoux said that eventually the protests will have an effect, especially since President Bush's rating is at an all time low. However, it is still relatively high, he said.

"I'm scared that there is no avoiding a confrontation with the man that is heading our country up right now," Kleppe said. "While I do respect the fact that Bush single-handedly put the inspectors in Iraq, I also feel that he is almost single-handedly going to start a war as well."

According to Bahcelli, there are one of two reasons why so many troops are being sent over to the Middle East now.

"They are either being sent over there for war or to give Saddam a message to scare him, to show him how big we really are," Bahcelli said.

"If there is a war, certainly it will be a major disaster for the Middle East and the United States," Dubois said.

President George W. Bush signs a resolution authorizing the use of force against Iraq in October.

Chief U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix, front right, and chief of the International Atomic Energy Agency Mohamed ElBaradei speak at a news conference in Baghdad, last week.

EDITORIAL OPINION

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Initiative needs to be taken to save our education

The House and Senate recently granted Gov. Mitt Romney expanded powers to cut more money in the budget, particularly for local aid and higher education. The original bill actually granted Romney more power. However, amendments in the Senate have kept the cuts from being a lot deeper. At least $200 million could potentially be cut from local aid and funding for state higher education could experience deep cuts.

This is no surprise to us at UMass.

Our University system is no stranger to budget cuts. Funding for state higher education has been on the backburner for years on Capitol Hill. Sadly, the majority of UMass students didn't care or fully understand this until last spring when the state invaded our wallets resulting in higher fees and less services. This campus lost seven varsity athletic teams, many faculty, staff and workers, and almost lost university childcare. Across the board, the other UMass campuses also suffered greatly.

While administrators were pointing fingers at politicians in the State House, UMass students began organizing ways to deal with the budget cuts. SCERA and SaveUMass got students to write letters and make phone calls to their representatives, senators and governor at the time, Jane Swift. The Student Government Association passed the Fair Share Act, asking high paid administrators to take a pay cut. Protests and rallies were held to attract more students to get involved in the fight for our education. All of this culminated in an unprecedented one-day protest and lobbying effort by schools from all over the state.

A year later, we're facing similar budgetary problems. There is no money to fund contracts, our academic departments will continue to suffer and tuition just went up again.

We, as the UMass community must re-ignite the momentum we had last spring. As Romney works on the budget, it's time once again to revisit the lessons we learned and put them into action.

We cannot sit idly by, and expect the other campuses to do all the work. As the flagship campus of the university system, we, at The Collegian believe the Amherst campus has a huge responsibility to continue to lead the charge in lobbying efforts. All of the UMass campuses have a stake in this and we need to work together collectively. Whether it's writing letters, visiting our representatives or helping to organize rallies and other students, every little bit plays a part. Furthermore, we need to force our university trustees and President Bulger to do their jobs and lobby for us.

We at The Collegian understand that these are shaky financial times for the Commonwealth. But just because there isn't money to fund many important services in the state is not an excuse to sit back and deal with it. Interest groups and concerned citizens are continuing to lobby for funding for their causes. Why shouldn't we as well?

We need to make it known on Beacon Hill that higher education in Massachusetts needs to be a priority. UMass students are the future of not only the Commonwealth but this nation as well. It is our education that is on the line. The question is, will we respond up in arms again or remain in the deafening silence.

LeBron jumping the gun?

Dan Lamothe

And the circus keeps growing.

Every time anyone opens the sports section lately, they're probably going to run into either LeBron James. James is a basketball phenomenon, compared to Michael Jordan and Kobe Bryant on a regular basis. He's one of the most sought out names on the Internet, as well, ranked with names such as Jordan, Bryant and Allen Iverson by nearly every search engine that keeps track.

Depending on how one looks at it though, there is one not so fine difference between James and the others. LeBron James just turned 18 years old.

James has become larger than life. He hasn't even gone to his senior prom yet and he's already the biggest name basketball player in the state – and that includes the Ohio State and Cleveland Cavaliers teams.

Which has to have its perks. Like having Nike and Adidas knocking on your door to offer you free sports gear because they want you to sign a $25 million sneaker endorsement deal with them. Or having your games moved from your high school gym to the University of Akron because your gym isn't big enough for all the people coming to see you anymore.

Then there's the stuff that doesn't show up in the newsstands since ESPN Magazine and Sports Illustrated have already done cover page stories on the kid). The girls. The respect. The doting fans. All in unhealthy doses that have to make it hard for LeBron to realize who's for real and who's after his first paycheck.

Recently, LeBron started sporting a H2 Hummer around town in Akron. Bought from a designer dealer in Los Angeles that also names Michael Jordan as a customer, there's some uncertainty as to where the money for such a ride could have come from.

Custom-made, it's not your run-of-the-mill high school vehicle –unless it's just me that has never seen a vehicle worth at least $70,000 sitting in a high school parking lot. Pimped out with multiple TVs, a video game hook-up and plush leather seats with 'King James' embroidered on them, it's pretty clear that the money for his new wheels didn't come from him working at the local Mickey D's or supermarket.

So where did it come from? Newspaper reports in Cleveland say that the money for the Hummer came from a loan that James's mother took out from U.S. Bank branch in Ohio. Reports also say that Gloria James is listed on the bank's Private Client Group list. The people on the list typically have a minimum of $500,000 to their name.

All of this raises red flags for authorities in scholastic sports in Ohio. The Ohio High School Athletic Association rules clearly state that "capitalizing on athletic fame by receiving money or gifts of monetary value" results in losing amateur status. Depending on where LeBron received the car, the Hummer could certainly fall under the gift category. Not that even he necessarily cares, but his amateur status could be in danger.

If everything is on the up-and-up and the James family has found a way to capitalize on LeBron's newfound fame, then good for them. I guess they're living out the American dream.

But if anything about the whole circus is being hidden to keep James legal, it's just plain selfish. By jumping the gun to cash on his fame now, LeBron would be jeopardizing the rest of his high school career, a move completely unfair to his high school teammates. Forfeiture of the games that he's played in since receiving the Hummer could cost the team, a team clearly talented even without James, a run at another state title.

Considering they could have won most of those games without him, that's just not right.

I can't help but feel bad for the rest of the players involved in the LeBron James show. It has to stink knowing that regardless of how well you play or how much effort you put in, you'll never be anything more than an extra in the Greatest Show on Earth. That the scrub at the end of the bench who gets a career-high 14 points won't even get a second mention in the paper the next morning just seems sad.

The show must go on, though, and for now, LeBron will keep on playing. Hopefully his teammates will eventually get some of the credit they deserve. While it was probably fun for a while, the rest of the team doesn't deserve dealing with all of the controversy swirling around LeBron James.

Gas thirsty a far cry from blood thirsty

Lindsey Elder

"This is George," a young girl's voice says of man filling up at a gas station. "This is the gas that George bought for his SUV," as a map image of the Middle East is flashed across the screen. "These are the countries where the executives bought the oil that made the gas that George bought for his SUV." The picture then switches to a scene of armed terrorists in a desert.

"And these are the terrorists who get money from those countries every time George fills up his SUV." At the close, the screen is filled with the words: "What is your SUV doing to our national security?"

The ads are a concoction of author and columnist Arianna Huffington and her minions involved in the Detroit Project. They were aired hoping to persuade Americans to abandon their SUVs and invest in more fuel-efficient vehicles by connecting their gas guzzling, to all-out support of terrorist activities. Although I agree fuel conservation is important, proposing that every Explorer or Blazer owner rides with Osama to get your point across is a bit much.

Her message, targeted at Detroit automakers and members of Congress, is far-fetched and unsupported. Instead of inspiring drivers to get out from behind the wheel of bigger, more powerful vehicles and into smaller death traps in the name of conservation, she has instead triggered a string of vandalism against innocent owners and dealers of the light trucks.

A second commercial from the group depicts a series of ordinary Americans saying things like: "I helped hijack an airplane" or, "I gave money to a terrorist training camp in a foreign country." So I suppose that means, in theory, if SUV owners support terrorists, then anyone who doesn't own an SUV supports the war on terrorism. The day that its biggest supporters can declare that they are truly sustaining their cause is when they stop taking private jets to the interviews to talk of such, and when their celebrity counterparts abandon limos to start carpooling in hybrids to the Oscars.

The ad's main creators live in sunny California, where four-wheel drive may not seem as important as it might to people who deal with driving to work or to school, such as all of us in the Northeast for instance, in often treacherous conditions of ice and snow. Statistics show that one in four drivers in the U.S. today owns an SUV. Personally I'm not a big fan of being that high up when I drive. However, I can hardly blame anyone else for wanting to be.

In today's society where the strong survive, I'd rather be in something big and powerful when the incompetent beside me gabbing away on their cell phone or freshening up their lip gloss loses control of their vehicle.

The message of the ad is to express the need that cars should be more fuel-efficient. Well, in my opinion, cars should also have autopilot, personal theaters in the back of every model, cost no more than 100 bucks a pop and run on liberal whining something it seems we'll never run out of in this country.

> "SUV owners supporting terrorism is as vague as blaming supermodels for any and every eating disorder in America."

In cases of vandalism spawned by the ads, tires were repeatedly slashed or cut with hatchets, which only requires replacement of the vehicles. The vandalism doesn't necessarily take any targets off the road.

The ad's realistic point can be found somewhere down beneath all of its fantasic propaganda, which is that the U.S. has surged its fuel and oil usage to the point where world violence is necessary to sustain it. However, SUVs are hardly the only ones to blame. With the obsession today with getting from point A to point B as outrageously fast as possible, manufacturers are following demand, with a V8 engine thrown into anything with wheels. SUV owners supporting terrorism is as vague as blaming supermodels for any and every eating disorder in America.

Even before the ads, the word SUV has long since had an evil shadow cast upon it. Late last year for instance, a group of church leaders calling their movement "What Would Jesus Drive" told Detroit automakers that it would discourage parishioners from buying gas-thirsty SUVs.

But the answer is simple. If you believe that money from oil imports go to terrorists, rather than smashing your neighbor's windshield or keying your message of "justice," buy gas from oil companies that don't buy from the Middle East, such as Citgo, Sunoco, Sinclair, BP/Phillips.

Keeping in mind we get almost as much of our crude oil from Canada and Mexico as we do the Middle East, even if all SUVs disappeared tomorrow, the U.S. economy would still be dependent on oil imported from the Middle East. Truthfully the simplest, most effective and direct way to get Americans to consume less gas is not to flash propaganda about hot button issues, it is to hike gas prices. America has been a lover of big cars since the Caddy's of the 1950s which took about the same amount of gas as today's Rodeo's and Avalanches. It's about safety, speed and an over all I'm big and important sense you get when you're in control of a machine of such magnitude.

Even if one wants to associate this obsession with an economic support of evil, blaming this generation entirely for something that started forty years ago is not the correct course of action.

Standardized testing, a political issue

Robert Carey

Two years ago, standardized testing was an issue of heated debate amongst state politicians who espoused it, and teachers, parents, students, and education experts, who opposed it.

Today, with standardized testing firmly established in 49 states, and financial backing in place, it seems that the tests are here to stay. In Massachusetts, the results haven't been surprising; the lowest tests scores come from lower class communities such as Dorchester and Worcester, and teachers have been pressured to conform their curriculum around the MCAS, at the risk of losing their job.

The burden put on lower class students has been slightly ameliorated by programs like the federal No Child Left Behind Act, which allows students to be transferred to better schools or receive financial assistance for tutelage. However, aside from the glass ceiling effect, the real problem lies with how these tests affect the educational experience of those forced to endure public education.

We must first understand that standardized testing is not an educational issue but a political one. Like many political issues with wealthy private interest, backed by its ever-present shadow, government, is the driving factor behind any issue's outcome.

The issue of standardized testing is no different. A lot of financial support, and interest for testing has come from the private sector. In a 1996 summit consisting of mega-corporations such as: AOL Time Warner, J. P. Morgan Chase, and IBM, a joint venture was constructed known as Achieve Inc. The business of Achieve Inc. was to construct the legislation for Standardized Testing as well as to act as a massive public relations firm to promote the notion that something was wrong with public education that could be fixed with extensive testing. Needless to say they have been successful.

But why is private interest so concerned with controlling public education? For one, it's a good way of curtailing the number of social and political dissidents that plague the doors of corporate business and who riddle the streets with signs and slogans during world trade summits. These people have always given big business bad press. You can be sure that the English section of the MCAS will never feature questions concerning the works of Huxley, Orwell, or Milton. And the math section of the MCAS will generally focus on subject matter that will be most relevant to a child's future as a corporate drone.

The difficulty of banning literature is also simplified by these tests. In the past, conjuring excuses to ban certain literary works from young questioning minds has been difficult. For instance, Mark Twain's books have been condemned in many classrooms because of his occasional, and yet nefarious use of the n-word. However, the vast racial overtones in Rudyard Kipling's The Man Who Would be King, goes ignored by most school boards, and is still taught frequently in classrooms around the nation.

With the arrival of MCAS the logic for excluding thought provoking literature becomes plain: "If it's not in the test why bother teaching it."

The same argument can be given for any other academic topic such as social science, art, and music. Most of these topics only make brief appearances on the test (if any at all), thus a struggling school can make the argument to get rid of them and focus on essential MCAS material. These tests are conducive to producing a nation-wide grid of monotonous beliefs, and against the expressive liberty of free thought. In the long run, the narrow academic spectrum of the next generation, encouraged by these tests, could lead to a boot rally-like mentality.

With standardized testing already having sunk its hooks into public education. It may be close to impossible to get rid of it. Therefore, the responsibility falls on the parents to teach and strengthen their children's intellect. However, at this point in time, I suggest private education for those capable of obtaining it.

New online certificate planned

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

UMassOnline, the University of Massachusetts web-based learning division, is offering a new online program for undergraduates in Criminal Justice.

The criminal justice certificate will be offered this coming semester and is now accessible entirely virtually. The program was available on campus through the sociology department in a traditional classroom setting for nearly 35 years.

"The UMass Amherst Criminal Justice Studies Certificate gives working adults a high degree of fluidity and flexibility," Anthony Harris, the certificate coordinator, said in a statement. "Now, working criminal justice professionals and other adults have a flexible new option for educational development, enhancing job credentials, and working towards completing a degree."

The program itself requires students to take six courses within the sociology department for three credits each and works in a similar way to an academic minor.

Students are required to take such classes as Criminology and the Sociology of Law in order to provide a foundation for law related careers.

"The program is designed to provide students with a solid foundation in the field of criminal justice and is intended to attract women and men planning or in the midst of careers ranging from law enforcement, to probation, to the courts, to corrections," according to the Continuing Education website. "The program focuses on criminal behavior by citizens, government officials and corporations."

Some of the courses offered through the program include Criminal Violence, Crime and Forensics, Cyber Crime, Domestic Violence, Juvenile Deliquency, Transnational Organized Crime, Probation and Parole and a number of others. The courses are taught virtually by members of the UMass faculty.

Distance Learning became an active initiative during 2000 when the University began to offer courses geared towards students who could not be physically present on the campus but were pursuing a college education.

During a meeting in 2000 University President William Bulger supported the need for distance education, explaining that it would give students who could not attend campus classes a chance at a higher education.

"We call this [distance learning] an investment because we are confident that it will be made back," Bulger explained in a previous Collegian story. "I'm very confident that people will want their University up to date on this kind of technology. Every single competitor is up to it right now so I think we have to be up to it."

The implementation of distance learning was not without controversy. Many organizations and individual students were apprehensive about the initiative due to the increasing number of budget cuts on campus. The UMass Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) has cautioned against distance learning for a number of years.

"We support the appropriate and measured use of distance technologies, but are convinced that this innovation should not take place at the cost of the core mission of our land grant university," the GEO website explains. "Nor do we understand how it will be possible to compete in the international distance market when our University is cutting academic funding."

Despite reservations distance learning is widely offered to students. The University now offers graduate programs in Accounting, Business, in certain types of Engineering, Plant and Soil Science, Music, Labor Studies and a number of other programs.

Undergraduates can receive a degree in Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration, Human Services or have the opportunity to earn a number of different certificates.

RAs continue bargaining sessions with administration

By Courtney Charles
Collegian Staff

"The University had almost all the power. Now they have to share the power and they don't like to share the power," James Shaw, president of the United Auto Workers Union said.

There have been three bargaining sessions between the University of Massachusetts and the Resident Assistant's (RA) union and the sessions will continue soon after the semester break. Although, according to Shaw, not a lot of progress has been made yet.

What are the RAs asking for?

The RAs want to improve their economic situation, Shaw explained, but their biggest issue is that the University has a long history of firing RAs.

He said that the union is looking to create a grievance procedure whereby an impartial party can hear RAs.

"There is an epidemic of the University punishing people," Shaw said.

In the past, RAs have been fired for playing their radios too loud and skateboarding in the halls, according to Shaw. The University's policy is that anyone who violates the rules is subject to punishment, he explained.

"This is not the way a responsible employer operates," Shaw said. "It is contrary to the goals of the University, especially when the University advocates for social justice."

An RA can get in trouble if a resident director catches them in violation or from a complaint filed by a student or another RA, Shaw said. The problem with scenario is that some people could file the complaints for revenge against the individual or simply because they do not like the RA.

"The University is going to have to treat people equally and fairly," Shaw explained. "They are going to have to sit down and work on issues."

One of the problems that Shaw said the union is having is that the University is claiming that the RAs are trying to negotiate academics. This is not the case, he explained. This has never been part of their argument.

Andy Kemmerer, junior and member of the Republican Club, disagrees.

"I can understand not having a grievance committee, but if an RA isn't keeping up their G.P.A., essentially it's making it harder to fire them," Kemmerer said. "Then they are basically negotiating grades. The University is has a conflict of interest because it gives grades and pay."

According to Shaw, the reason that the University is being so resistant is that the flexibility to fire people who they don't like will leave.

"In general, employers are always reluctant to enter into a binding agreement," Shaw said.

Kemmerer cites different reasons for the reluctance of the University.

"Unionizing is very expensive for a company, especially for a school," Kemmerer said.

The union campaign for the RAs began in January of 2001. There had never before been a union of undergraduates. Shaw said. The RAs sought out the union.

According to Shaw at this time the University began its own anti-union campaign. He said the University argued that the RAs had no right to have a union.

The union went before to the state. There was a hearing before the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission where the University argued that the RAs were not workers. In January of 2002 the commission ruled that the RAs did have a right to have a union.

"Personally, I think they do have a right to unionize, but they have to realize that the state and the University can't even fund the contracts they already promised," Kemmerer said. "It doesn't make any logical sense. When you get fired from your job you don't go out and buy a new car. When your pay gets cut you don't go out and buy a new house."

However the University still refused to bargain with the RAs claiming that they were not legally obligated to do so. As a counter attack on April 29, 35 people were arrested in the Whitmore Administration Building for civil disobedience. Shaw explained. There were 15 people at a sit-in in the administrative offices.

"Instead of sitting down and talking things out, the administration turned a blind eye and called the police," Shaw said. An additional 20 people were arrested at a sit-in in front of the bus the police brought for the 15, he said.

On July 31, union and the University sat down. The University agreed to recognize the union as long as the RAs didn't negotiate academics.

In September the RAs bargaining committee, consisting of eight members, drafted a proposal. Since then there has been three bargaining sessions with the University.

"I wish I could kill the RA union," Blake Kleppe, sophomore and member of the Student Government Association Senate said. "I can't see how they don't think it was the stupidest thing they could do because it was."

"I'm not Mr. Pro-union, but I do think workers should have the right to bargain," Kemmerer said. "They're not doing it the right way though. They're not thinking of the consequences of their actions."

"The RAs are not complaining. They are looking to improve their position." Shaw said. "They are leaving a stronger legacy behind, a stronger RA position."

Professor emeritus dies of illness at 88

By Amy O'Neill
Collegian Staff

Professor Emeritus Vladimir Haensel passed away on Dec. 15, 2002 at the age of 88 following a brief illness. He was one of the University of Massachusetts's most distinguished researchers and winner of the National Medal of Science.

A professor in Chemical Engineering at UMass until his retirement in 1998, Haensel had a profound impact on his profession, including being elected to the National Academy of Engineering and the National Academy of Sciences.

Prior to coming to UMass in 1981, he worked with UOP (formerly Universal Oil Products) and was the company's vice president for research. Haensel led the team that invented a chemical engineering process essential in producing clean fuel for transportation and in supplying materials to the plastics industry called "platforming."

The platforming process uses extremely small particles of platinum, one of the world's most precious metals, to drastically speed up certain chemical reactions. This converts petroleum to high-performance fuels. Platforming is considered to be one of the most significant techniques in chemical engineering in the last 50 years because it creates cleaner burning high-octane fuel, which eliminates the need to add lead to gasoline.

This and many other contributions earned Haensel the National Medal of Science in 1975, and the Perkin Medal in 1967. He was also the first recipient of the National Academy of Sciences Award for Chemistry in Service to Society and was awarded the Charles Stark Draper Prize of the National Academy of Engineering at the age of 85. This prize is considered the highest honor in the Engineering Profession and Haensel was the first chemical engineer and university professor to receive it.

He was awarded the Chancellor's Medal and as a tribute to him on his 80th birthday, and the chemical engineering department established a scholarship fund for undergraduates funded by the UOP.

Haensel also won the College of Engineering Outstanding Teacher award at the age of 78, back in 1993. He told his theories of teaching back when he was presented with the award.

"The reason why UMass hired me in 1980 was to talk about the research I had done before. My whole course was based on my research work," Haensel said.

Haensel commented at the time that teaching came so naturally to him because he was simply teaching students his life. "I had all that research background as a head start," Haensel said.

He always felt that patience was the most important when it came to performing experiments and wanted to make sure that his students understood that as well.

"What you teach them is how to take care, how to measure things properly, and how to recognize when a result is valid," Haensel said. "Doing rather than showing in the classroom makes an awful lot of difference."

Longtime friend and colleague of Haensel, UMass Professor Peter Monson, also realized the uniqueness of Haensel's talents.

"Val's achievements, both in his industrial career with UOP, and later as a teacher and scholar at UMass, were truly extraordinary," Monson said.

Haensel was born in Germany in 1914 to Russian parents who returned to Russia after World War I began. Before coming to the United States in 1929, Haensel's family lived all over Europe including Germany, France and Austria. He attended school at Northwestern University and then at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Haensel is survived by his wife Hertha Skala Haensel, his daughter Kathee of Virginia Beach and three grandchildren.

In place of sending flowers, Haensel's family has asked that donations be sent to the Haensel UOP Award Fund at 142 Marston Hall, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003.

Commitee reveals theme for Lombardi inauguration

By DAN LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi's February inauguration will feature the theme "The Academic Imperative," including an all day symposia Feb. 6 with professors from every college and school at UMass speaking.

The inauguration itself takes place on Feb. 7 at 10 a.m. in the Mullins Center, with lunch to follow. About 500 invited guests will also attend a gala dinner in the evening on Feb. 6.

"Teaching and research lie at the heart of the academic imperative," Lombardi said in a statement that is the basis for the theme. Without them, universities cease to exist. They must be protected and protected above all else."

The purpose of the symposia is to showcase the areas of teaching, research, and learning activities to be found at UMass-Amherst, according to a release on the UMass web site. Organizers plan to "highlight student and faculty accomplishments, honor supporters and seek additional outside support to assure a bright future for UMass-Amherst."

The Academic Symposia includes more than 50 speakers. These symposia will tap the talent of every school and college on campus with speakers ranging from some of our most promising undergraduates to many of our most illustrious faculty members," the web site said. "The emphasis throughout will be on showcasing the broad range of cutting-edge teaching and research being conducted at UMass-Amherst."

Several nationally known members of the UMass faculty will speak, including microbiologist Derek Lovely, geoscientist Lynn Margulis, sociologist Ja Deneraih and market research expert Charles Schewe.

The symposia begin at 9:30 a.m. in rooms off the Lower Concourse of the Campus Center and run every half hour until 4 p.m. Presentations will be made on research, teaching and learning concurrently in each time slot.

For a complete listing of Academic Symposia events, see the schedule at right.

"We have a first-class chancellor and we will have the appropriate inagural activities surround his installation," said Elizabeth Dale, assistant chancellor for development who cochairs the inaugural committee, to the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Bulger faints at funeral

Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — University of Massachusetts President William Bulger was released from the hospital on Jan. 15 after tests showed he had no more than a fainting spell during the funeral of Boston Globe sports columnist Will McDonough.

Bulger was conscious and talking as he was removed from St. Augustine's Church in South Boston on a stretcher at about noon. He was taken by ambulance to Massachusetts General Hospital.

"He had what we call a simple faint," said Bulger's doctor, Dr. Laurence Ronan. "His tests all came back absolutely normal."

Bulger never lost consciousness and was joking when he came into the hospital, Ronan said. Bulger felt hot, a bit woozy and lightheaded before he fainted in the packed church, Ronan said.

The former Senate president, 68, was a longtime friend of McDonough, who died last week of a heart attack. He covered sports for the Globe for more than 40 years.

Bulger, an honorary pallbearer at the funeral, was sitting in the front pew when he collapsed.

McDonough and Bulger both grew up in South Boston. McDonough was Bulger's campaign manager when he ran for his first political office, state representative, in 1960.

McDonough was also a friend of Bulger's brother, fugitive mob boss James "Whitey" Bulger. He once visited James Bulger at the notorious Alcatraz prison, where he was serving time for bank robbery.

William Bulger said McDonough provided him with "the friendship of a lifetime."

"Will McDonough's friends were never lonely. He was there during the bright moments and always on hand during times of adversity," Bulger said.

Last month, McDonough defended Bulger after he took the Fifth Amendment before a Congressional committee seeking information about his fugitive brother's whereabouts. William Bulger told a grand jury in 2001 that his brother called him shortly after going on the run in 1995, but that he has not heard from him since.

Bulger's spokesman, Robert Connolly, said Bulger does not have a history of serious health problems.

"He exercises every day, he rides a stationary bike every morning," Connolly said. "He's in good health."

Bulger spokesman John Hoey told the Collegian last week that Bulger was doing fine.

"He's doing great," Hoey said. "He went in around noon and was out by 3:30 [p.m.]. He was at work at 8 a.m. the next day."

Deputy chief hired

Newly appointed Deputy Chief of Police Patrick Archbald said that he plans to focus his attention for the first six months on the job on new initiatives that the department has planned.

By DAN LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Police Department filled a vacancy last month when Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor appointed Officer Patrick Archbald as Deputy Chief of Police.

"I am very much looking forward to being in supervision," Archbald said. "I care very much about the department, the officers and the students."

Archbald has been with UMPD for 16 years as a patrolman, with stints on each shift, including five years as a member of the mounted unit. At the same time, he has also excelled as chief of police for the town of Williamsburg.

Archbald has been honored with several formal awards, including the Medal of Honor, Grand Cordon Award, Exceptional Duty Citation, Educational Medal Achievement and many letters of commendation.

"Pat has a strong success with his chief's job at Williamsburg," Chief O'Connor said. "He's an innovative thinker who solves problems."

O'Connor said that Archbald's duties will be to "run the day-to-day operations of the department," overseeing things such as the training of officers and other administrative work.

"He's respected among his peers and he's a natural leader," O'Connor said.

As deputy chief, Archbald sees his role as clearly defined.

"My major focus is to work on improving communication on all levels of the department, and to help refine a number of programs the chief has initiated," he said.

Archbald mentioned the new police cadet program and the revamped K-9 program as examples of initiatives that need refining.

Externally, Archbald is looking to elevate UMPD's profile on the state level.

"I really need to do what I can to bridge the communication gap between UMPD and the Department of Public Safety in Boston," he said. "Right now we do not receive any funding."

He would like to be able to have connections close enough in the Department of Public Safety where it will be able to bring grants to the University of Massachusetts to improve policing on campus.

Getting grants has been one of Archbald's specialties. While serving as Williamsburg's Chief of Police, he was able to obtain $500,000 in grants from a variety of sources, including a $149,433 grant in 1999 from the U.S. Justice Department Violence Against Women program for domestic training.

Archbald was able to use the half a million dollars secured to keep Williamsburg on the cutting edge of police technology.

Archbald estimated that he has been working about 70 hours a week between his job at UMPD and his job with the Williamsburg police force, with about 15 of those hours in Williamsburg. Nevertheless, he has a positive outlook on the job.

"I'm in a very advantageous position," Archbald said.

He explained that it is unprecedented for someone to move up from the patrolman ranks to Deputy Chief.

"I can bring fresh ideas from the patrol to the command staff meetings," he said.

Overall, Archbald is happy with the direction UMPD is taking. He noted that very few departments have the resources to initiate two programs as big as the cadet program and the K-9 program at the same time successfully.

"It's a very progressive department," he said. "Everyone is moving forward in trying to get bigger and better and make this campus a safer one."

Archbald graduated from Springfield College in 1984 and is currently pursuing a master's degree at UMass in Public Policy Administration. He lives in Williamsburg with his wife and his son Conor.

Students involved in drug bust plead not guilty

Twenty-four thousand dollars in drug related paraphenalia and cash was found in Coolidge Hall.

Two students involved in the biggest drug bust at the University of Massachusetts in 30 years pleaded not guilty to multiple charges last month in Hampshire Superior Court in Northampton in separate arraignments.

Steven Y. Nguyen, 19, and Yuta Nakamura, 22, were arrested Nov. 14 following a police search of their dorm room at 707 Kennedy Hall, University of Massachusetts Police reported finding 1.5 pounds of marijuana, individually wrapped bags of marijuana, other drug related paraphernalia and $24,000 in cash.

The $24,000 represents the largest cash seizure in 30 years at the University, according to UMPD spokesman Jim Lyons.

UMPD Patrol and Detective Units came across the drugs and cash in an unrelated search of the room. They had obtained a search warrant to search the room for a laptop computer stolen in Coolidge Hall last April. According to UMPD, the laptop was also found in the room.

According to Officer Gregory Oravec, the head of the laptop investigation, both students were sleeping when police arrived and the drugs and paraphernalia were mostly out in the open.

"The room was a mess," he said.

Nguyen, of Southborough, Mass., was charged with receiving stolen property valued at more than $250, possession with intent to distribute a Class D substance (marijuana) and possession of a Class D substance. His roommate, Nakamura, was charged with possession of a Class D substance.

NEW YORK (AP) - A 21-year-old University of Massachusetts-Amherst student was attacked by a knife-wielding stranger as she waited on a downtown Manhattan subway platform early Jan. 10, police said.

Yael Leopold was slashed across the forehead by a man she described as wearing a red, hooded jacket and carrying a pen knife with a sharp point, officials said.

Leopold, who was staying with friends in Brooklyn, was on her way home from Webster Hall, an East Village nightclub, when the suspect approached her on the platform at about 5:30 a.m., police said.

She told police that the man asked if she was a prostitute. She laughed and said no, which is when the suspect slashed her, police said.

A track worker heard a scream on a Chambers Street platform of the "F" train and alerted police, New York City Transit spokesman Paul Fleuranges said. The suspect fled along the tracks, Fleuranges said.

Leopold was taken to Bellevue Hospital, where surgeons closed three cuts on her scalp and face and two on her left hand with several dozen stitches, said Dr. Vasiliki Karlis, the hospital's director of oral and facial surgery.

Surgeons also repaired minor nerve damage in her left thumb.

"She was distraught, but she was very strong," Karlis said.

The cuts on her scalp cut to the bone, while the hand wounds were superficial, Karlis said. The woman will be left with three scars on her face and scalp, the longest almost 4 inches long, doctors said.

She was listed in fair condition that afternoon and was expected to be released within 24 hours.

"She's awake and alert, and she's resting comfortably," Karlis said.

University of Massachusetts spokeswoman Barbara Pitoniak said Leopold, of Amherst, Mass., is a senior majoring in sociology.

The night of Jan. 10, Joseph Cormier, 26, was stabbed in the neck with a box cutter while waiting for a No. 7 train at the Queens-boro Plaza station in Queens.

An 18-year-old man was stabbed in a Manhattan subway station the morning of Jan.12. The man was slashed while waiting for a No. 4 train at about 4:15 a.m., when he got into a dispute with five other people standing on the Bowling Green station platform.

Commitee reveals theme for Lombardi inauguration

By DAN LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi's February inauguration will feature the theme "The Academic Imperative," including an all day symposia Feb. 6 with professors from every college and school at UMass speaking.

The inauguration itself takes place on Feb. 7 at 10 a.m. in the Mullins Center with lunch to follow. About 500 invited guests will also attend a gala dinner in the evening on Feb. 6.

"Teaching and research lie at the heart of the academic imperative," Lombardi said in a statement that is the basis for the theme. "Without them, universities cease to exist. They must be preserved and protected above all else."

The purpose of the symposia is to showcase "the array of teaching, research, and outreach activities to be found at UMass-Amherst," according to a release on the UMass web site. Organizers plan to highlight student and faculty accomplishments, honor supporters and seek additional outside support to assure a bright future for UMass-Amherst.

The Academic Symposia includes more than 50 speakers. There symposia will tap the talent of every school and college on campus, with speakers ranging from some of our most promising undergraduates to many of our most illustrious faculty members," the web site said. "The emphasis throughout will be on showcasing the broad range of cutting-edge teaching and research being conducted at UMass-Amherst."

Several nationally known members of the UMass faculty will speak, including microbiologist Derek Lovley, geographer Lynn Margulis, sociologist Ira Deneroff and marketing expert Charles Schewe.

The symposia begin at 9:30 a.m. in rooms off the Lower Concourse of the Campus Center and run every half hour until 4 p.m. Presentations will be made on research, teaching and learning concurrently in each time slot.

For a complete listing of Academic Symposia events see the schedule at right.

"We have a first-class chancellor and we will have the appropriate inaugural activities surround his installation," said Elizabeth Daly, assistant chancellor for development who co-chairs the inaugural committee, to the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Bulger faints at funeral

Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – University of Massachusetts President William Bulger was released from the hospital on Jan. 15 after tests showed he had no more than a fainting spell during the funeral of Boston Globe sports columnist Will McDonough.

Bulger was conscious and talking as he was removed from St. Augustine's Church in South Boston on a stretcher at about noon. He was taken by ambulance to Massachusetts General Hospital.

"He had what we call a simple faint," said Bulger's doctor, Dr. Laurence Ronan. "His tests all came back absolutely normal."

Bulger never lost consciousness and was joking when he came into the hospital, Ronan said. Bulger felt hot, a bit woozy and lightheaded before he fainted in the packed church, Ronan said.

The former Senate president, 68, was a longtime friend of McDonough, who died last week of a heart attack. He covered sports for the Globe for more than 40 years.

Bulger, an honorary pallbearer at the funeral, was sitting in the front pew when he collapsed.

McDonough and Bulger both grew up in South Boston. McDonough was Bulger's campaign manager when he ran for his first political office, state representative, in 1960.

McDonough was also a friend of Bulger's brother, fugitive mob boss James "Whitey" Bulger. He once visited James Bulger at the notorious Alcatraz prison, where he was serving time for bank robbery.

William Bulger said McDonough provided him with "the friendship of a lifetime."

"Will McDonough's friends were never lonely. He was there during the bright moments and always on hand during times of adversity," Bulger said.

Last month, McDonough defended Bulger after he took the Fifth Amendment before a Congressional committee seeking information about his fugitive brother's whereabouts. William Bulger told a grand jury in 2001 that his brother called him shortly after going on the run in 1995, but that he has not heard from him since.

Bulger's spokesman, Robert Connolly, said Bulger does not have a history of serious health problems.

"He exercises every day, he rides a stationary bike every morning," Connolly said. "He's in good health."

Bulger spokesman John Hoey told the Collegian last week that Bulger was doing fine.

"He's doing great," Hoey said. "He went in around noon and was out by 3:30 [p.m.]. He was at work at 8 a.m. the next day."

Deputy chief hired

Newly appointed Deputy Chief of Police Patrick Archbald said that he plans to focus his attention for the first six months on the job on new initiatives that the department has planned.

By DAN LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Police Department filled a vacancy last month when Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor appointed Officer Patrick Archbald as Deputy Chief of Police.

"I am very much looking forward to being in supervision," Archbald said. "I care very much about the department, the officers and the students."

Archbald has been with UMPD for 16 years as a patrolman, with stints on each shift, including five years as a member of the mounted unit. At the same time, he has also excelled as chief of police for the town of Williamsburg.

Archbald has been honored with several formal awards, including the Medal of Honor, Grand Cordon Award, Exceptional Duty Citation, Educational Medal Achievement and many letters of commendation.

"Pat has a strong success with his chief's job at Williamsburg," Chief O'Connor said. "He's an innovative thinker who solves problems."

O'Connor said that Archbald's duties will be to "run the day-to-day operations of the department," overseeing things such as the training of officers and other administrative work.

"He's respected among his peers and he's a natural leader," O'Connor said.

As deputy chief, Archbald sees his role as clearly defined.

"My major focus is to work on improving communication on all levels of the department, and to help refine a number of programs the chief has initiated," he said.

Archbald mentioned the new police cadet program and the revamped K-9 program as examples of initiatives that need refining.

Externally, Archbald is looking to elevate UMPD's profile on the state level.

"I really need to do what I can to bridge the communication gap between UMPD and the Department of Public Safety in Boston," he said. "Right now we do not receive any funding."

He would like to be able to have connections close enough in the Department of Public Safety where it will be able to bring grants to the University of Massachusetts to improve policing on campus.

Getting grants has been one of Archbald's specialties. While serving as Williamsburg's Chief of Police, he was able to obtain $500,000 in grants from a variety of sources, including a $149,435 grant in 1999 from the U.S. Justice Department Violence Against Women program for domestic training. Archbald was able to use the half a million dollars secured to keep Williamsburg on the cutting edge of police technology.

Archbald estimated that he has been working about 70 hours a week between his job at UMPD and his job with the Williamsburg police force, with about 15 of those hours in Williamsburg. Nevertheless, he has a positive outlook on the job.

"I'm in a very advantageous position," Archbald said.

He explained that it is unprecedented for someone to move up from the patrolmen ranks to Deputy Chief.

"I can bring fresh ideas from the patrol to the command staff meetings," he said.

Overall, Archbald is happy with the direction UMPD is taking. He noted that very few departments have the resources to initiate two programs as big as the cadet program and the K-9 program at the same time successfully.

"It's a very progressive department," he said. "Everyone is moving forward in trying to get bigger and better and make this campus a safer one."

Archbald graduated from Springfield College in 1984 and is currently pursuing a master's degree at UMass in Public Policy Administration. He lives in Williamsburg with his wife and his son Conor.

Students involved in drug bust plead not guilty

Twenty-four thousand dollars in drug related paraphenalia and cash was found in Coolidge Hall.

Two students involved in the biggest drug bust at the University of Massachusetts in 30 years pleaded not guilty to multiple charges last month in Hampshire Superior Court in Northampton in separate arraignments.

Steven Y. Nguyen, 19, and Yuta Nakamura, 22, were arrested Nov. 14 following a police search of their dorm room at 707 Kennedy Hall. University of Massachusetts Police reported finding 1.5 pounds of marijuana, individually wrapped bags of marijuana, other drug related paraphernalia and $24,000 in cash.

The $24,000 represents the largest cash seizure in 30 years at the University, according to UMPD spokesman Jim Lyons.

UMPD Patrol and Detective Units came across the drugs and cash in an unrelated search of the room. They had obtained a search warrant to search the room for a laptop computer stolen in Coolidge Hall last April. According to UMPD, the laptop was also found in the room.

According to Officer Gregory Oravec, the head of the laptop investigation, both students were sleeping when police arrived and the drugs and paraphernalia were mostly out in the open.

"The room was a mess," he said.

Nguyen, of Southborough, Mass., was charged with receiving stolen property valued at more than $250, possession with intent to distribute a Class D substance (marijuana) and possession of a Class D substance. His roommate, Nakamura, was charged with possession of a Class D substance.

Kaiser comes to Boston

By DENISE LAVOIE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) – The same day the FBI announced Kenneth Kaiser's appointment to head its troubled Boston office, a Congressional committee released a report calling the agency's use of criminal informants "one of the greatest failures in the history of federal law enforcement."

Kaiser comes to the Boston FBI office at a time when public confidence in the agency is at an all-time low, battered by revelations that some Boston agents looked the other way as mobsters they used as informants committed murders.

Former Agent John J. Connolly Jr. was convicted of racketeering last year after a jury found that he tipped off mobster informant James "Whitey" Bulger in 1995 that he was about to be indicted.

Bulger has been a fugitive ever since, and the Boston FBI office has had to fight the perception that it has been less than zealous in its search for Bulger, who is now on the agency's Ten Most Wanted list.

In addition, a Congressional committee that has been investigating the Justice Department's use of informants has zeroed in on problems in Boston, dating to the 1965 murder of Edward "Teddy" Deegan.

Three men convicted of the Deegan killing were released after serving more than 30 years in prison after the Justice Department turned over documents showing the FBI had information that could have cleared the men, but protected the informant who masterminded the killing.

Kaiser, a 20-year FBI veteran who is scheduled to take over in Boston in March, would not discuss the Deegan case or the fallout from the Connolly case.

"It's very hard for me to dwell on the past, but I will tell you that I find the best way to restore the confidence of the public is to initiate good investigations and bring good investigations to the table, and that's what I plan to do," he said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press on Thursday.

Kaiser, who has headed the New Orleans FBI office for the last 18 months, started with the agency in 1982, following in the footsteps of his father, who worked as an FBI agent in Chicago for 30 years.

The younger Kaiser worked in New York, New Orleans and Detroit, and as head of the Indianapolis office.

In 1990, he was promoted to the counterterrorism planning unit at FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C. In that job, he headed FBI security at the Atlanta and Barcelona Olympics, and at the 1994 World Cup soccer tournament. He also developed a program to assess the vulnerability of the 18 largest airports in the United States.

Kaiser said his top priority in Boston will be counterterrorism work. He also said he will focus on cybercrime and public corruption – an area he focused on in New Orleans, where he led an investigation that resulted in more than 60 arrests, most of them cab drivers accused of bribing city workers for permits.

During his time in New Orleans, the bureau was criticized for wiretapping and investigating a woman who ran a high-priced bordello. Critics said the investigation was a poor use of FBI resources in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, but Kaiser defended the investigation, saying the FBI had jurisdiction because the case crossed state lines.

New Orleans U.S. Attorney Jim Letten, who has worked with Kaiser on various public corruption cases, said Kaiser has worked well with federal, state and local law enforcement agencies.

"He is prepared to deal with the most difficult of issues," Letten said.

Alumnus bestows endowment

By AMY O'NEILL

The University of Massachusetts has been awarded a gift of one million dollars to establish an endowed professorship, thanks to a Boston businessman who received an honorary degree from UMass in 2001.

Terrence Murray, Chairman of FleetBoston Financial, donated the money to create the Terrence Murray Commonwealth College Honors Professorship. The donation meets guidelines that require a $500,000 matching grant by the state, making the professorship worth $1.5 million.

UMass President William M. Bulger made the announcement of the gift in Boston back in December. According to the Hampshire Gazette, Bulger described Murray as an "exemplary leader in the business community."

He also said that because of this gift he is setting an example for the business world.

"The Terrence Murray Commonwealth College Professorship is a compelling statement of belief in the university faculty's ability to provide our students with an outstanding education," Bulger said. "The University of Massachusetts deeply appreciates Mr. Murray's support."

Murray's other connections with UMass include his working relationship with James E. Mahoney, UMass Trustee and Senior Vice President and Director of Corporate Affairs for FleetBoston Financial.

The gift marks the first major private donation announced since Chancellor John V. Lombardi came into office in July. According to the Gazette, Lombardi has promised to substantially increase private funding for the University and is creating a new foundation for UMass.

Robert Connolly, Bulger's spokesman, said that the professorship will rotate among Commonwealth College faculty and that the funding will be used to develop innovative courses and programs within Commonwealth College.

Commonwealth College opened in 1998 as the first honors college in the University system. The Murray professorship is the first endowed chair for the College, which now has 2,500 students now enrolled.

Bulger became UMass president in 1996 and since then, the University endowment has increased from $47 million to $150 million. The number of endowment chairs has increased from four to more than 40.

Students awarded scholarships

By AMY O'NEILL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Amherst Alumni Association recently presented six promising undergraduate students with scholarships thanks to the "Leaders in the Making Scholarship Program."

The program was created by the UMass Alumni Association in hopes of encouraging students in their future pursuits. The sophomore and junior students chosen have met requirements of diverse records of achievement in leadership and volunteer work and have presented themselves as role models.

Four students were awarded with this year's "Leaders in the Making Scholarship" of $2,000.

Baraka Abdullasiam is a junior majoring in Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration from Brockton, MA. While serving as secretary of the Student Government Association and actively belonging to Phi Theta Kappa, she has maintained a 3.98 grade point average. She also volunteers for the American Red Cross Society and the Big Brother Big Sister Program. After she graduates, she hopes to manage a five star international hotel.

Tracy Kirschen is a sophomore majoring in Psychology from New York. Kirschen, who has a grade point average of 3.72, is a Commonwealth College Scholar and is active in the College's Community Service Learning Program–Citizen Scholars Program. She is also a member of the Psi Chi National Honor Society in Psychology and worked as a research assistant for Dr. Elliott Blass. In addition, Kirschen serves as a senator in the SGA and volunteers at the Bangs Community Center in Amherst. In the future she hopes to become an industrial/organizational psychologist.

Alessandra Rosa is junior Communication major minoring in Spanish and Psychology. With a grade point average of 3.86, Rosa is a Commonwealth College Scholar, is on the Dean's List and is in the ALANA Honor Society and the National Society of Collegiate Scholars. In addition, she works for the UMass Amherst Video Instructional Program, participates in the "Not Ready for Bedtime Players" theater troupe and was a member of the Women's Crew Team.

Joey Rubin, a sophomore majoring in Management with a focus on Premed, hopes to become a pediatrician after graduation. She holds a grade point average of 3.86 and is a member of Commonwealth College, the National Society of Collegiate Scholars and Alpha Lambda Delta. Rubin also volunteers for the American Red Cross and a member of the Varsity Lacrosse Team.

One scholarship of $700 is awarded to a student who demonstrates outstanding leadership capabilities in the Student Alumni Relations Society and within the larger University Community. This year's Student Alumni Relations Society Alumni Merit Based Scholarship was awarded to Annemarie Dalba.

Dalba is a sophomore in the Isenberg School of Management. She holds a 3.8 grade point average and is a Commonwealth College Scholar. She is also a member of Alpha Lambda Delta and the National Society of Collegiate Scholars. In addition, Dalba is involved with the Isenberg School of Management as a member of the Undergraduate Leadership Council and the Isenberg Honors Council. She is actively involved with the Student Alumni Relations Society as well and serves as one of the Chancellor's Personal Hosts.

The last recipient of a UMass Amherst Alumni Scholarship was through the Robert. B. Collins Student Alumni Relations Society Scholarship. This award is given to a student demonstrating outstanding service in the Student Alumni Relations Society, the University, the community and academic success and is awarded $1,000.

This year's recipient is Laura Klesh, a junior majoring in Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration. She holds a grade point average of 3.42 and serves as treasurer of the Eta Sigma Delta Hospitality Honor Society. Klesh is also a member of the National Society of Collegiate Scholars and the Student Alumni Relations Society. She also serves as one of the Chancellor's Personal Hosts.

According to the UMass Amherst Alumni Association, their goal is to provide services and programs that enlighten, strengthen and develop students, faculty, staff, Association members and alumni at UMass.

diverse group."

According to O'Connor, two of the applicants who have been selected for the next step are UMass undergrads. She doesn't see it as an issue that there could be cadets living in the dorm rooms, saying that the cadets will be able to separate their personal lives from their lives on the job.

"I don't think that's something students should worry about," O'Connor said.

Archbald agreed. "We want these students who want to be police officers to be successful as students," he said. "We're not looking to put students in that position."

ACLU takes legal action

By S.J. PORT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Concerned about the questioning of economics Professor Musaddak Alhabeeb, the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) filed a request on Dec. 12 2002, the day after a forum entitled "The FBI versus the People" was held at the University of Massachusetts, for information on campus police officers that investigate people under the USA Patriot Act.

The ACLU is demanding that the FBI reveal the scope of its involvement not only on the UMass campus but also on college campuses nationwide.

An FBI agent and UMass Police Detective Barry Flanders questioned iraqi-born Alhabeeb on campus in October of 2002. Flanders works full time for the UMPD and as their liaison to the Joint Terrorism Task Force affiliated with the FBI's Springfield office. Flander's presence on campus as a liaison to the bureau has created some controversy as members of faculty especially call into question the purpose of the FBI on campus and whether it could hinder academic freedom.

In November, professors, students and staff protested Alhabeb's interrogation and the presence of the FBI on campus. The offices of ALANA Affairs, the UMass Anti-War Coalition and the Department of Social Thought and Political Economy (STPEC) held the follow-up forum entitled "The FBI versus The People" on December 11.

The ACLU received notice on Dec. 26 that their request had been received by the FBI and would be processed. The federal agency by law had 10 working days after receiving the request to respond with some sort of acknowledgement.

According to attorney William Newman, "It took 11 days for the information to get on the FBI docket because all FBI mail is methodically screened," he told the Hampshire Gazette. "Next step we will request expedited consideration of our request bade on the interest of the public in this matter. I can't give you a specific timeframe, but we will try to have this request given a quicker response. If it's negative, there is always recourse to challenge the FBI's response in federal court."

The FBI may take up to two years to fulfill the request, according to Linda Colton, a public information officer for Freedom of Information Act requests in Washington.

"It depends on how long it takes to find the record," she told the Hampshire Gazette. "Once the records are found, then they have to process them and they may be exempt for various reasons."

In the meantime, UMass professors are looking for answers. At the most recent Faculty Senate meeting, Senator Maria Calas asked Chancellor John Lombardi to express his views on the issue in relation to academic freedom.

"Our faculty and staff have the right to academic freedom. They have the right to talk about things in their classes and in the doing of their University duties that is appropriate, and we have a very strong commitment to that. If we see it violated, we will speak to that issue," the Chancellor said. "Secondly, all of us have the right to free speech in this University. All of us have the right to hold whatever ideas we choose and to speak those ideas in appropriate ways without having them suppressed by anybody, whether it be the Chancellor or the University or anyone else."

Lombardi went onto say that he felt that this campus was less than enthusiastic in its support of the notion that everybody is allowed to speak their mind without "intimidating tactics, whatever the subject or whomever the speaker."

Lombardi also emphasized that the UMPD has a responsibility to work with other law enforcement offices in "all kinds of contexts."

He said that he feels it is best to have a relationship with the FBI and Terrorism Task Force so as to keep a finger on the campus pulse and what influence they are having and have a grasp of what they are doing.

UMPD Chief Barbara O'Connor similarly believes that Flander's position is one of assistance, not hindrance to the University.

"Since 9-11, one of the criticisms that has come out is a lack of sharing information," said O'Connor. "As a public agency, we have a responsibility to contribute to the safety of the community and this region. When we can do that, we're going to. The problem with serious crimes is that they're not restricted to jurisdictions."

O'Connor also said that the FBI is legal to investigate anything on campus regardless of whether or not Flanders' post exists.

The request of information about the handling of and interrogation of Alhabeeb is a sore point for O'Connor, who was upset by the way that police were used as a "vehicle to harass" Alhabeeb. She has said that federal charges could be brought on the people who filed the false report that led to his questioning if it is determined who they are.

A recent Boston Globe survey revealed that UMass is only one of many campuses across the nation that are committing a campus officer to work on antiterrorism task forces for anywhere from a few hours a week to several days a month. The Globe noted that "other large public universities across the country report similar relationships, although most involve a smaller time commitment" than that of Detective Flanders who reports to the Springfield FBI office nearly full time unless there is an emergency and the UMPD requires his assistance (however UMass continues to pay his annual salary of 41,359 while the federal agency pays for any overtime and incidental expenses).

The assignment of campus officers was triggered by a post 9-11 invitation to police departments in towns, cities and on campuses by the FBI to cooperate with regional antiterrorism task forces.

According to the Globe's report many towns and campuses have assigned liaison officers without controversy, while the partnership at UMass has sparked continued debate and uproar over the issue of academic freedom. The new balance according to the report is between higher government security demands, student privacy and academic freedom. Many professors recall the heavy-handed 1950's tactics of the FBI and resent their renewed presence.

"There is no reason to believe that the bureau has changed at all," UMass Professor Emeritus Milton Cantor told the Boston Globe. "Given the climate outside the FBI, I think it's entirely predictable that the FBI will be intrusive."

Besides UMass, there are at least three towns participating in the program with the Springfield office, including Springfield, Pittsfield and Amherst.

The Globe report stated that at the University of Carolina at Chapel Hill, a liaison agent devotes two days a month to antiterrorism work while the University of California at Los Angeles one officer is an assigned liaison. The University of Colorado at Boulder has an officer working an estimated three hours a week on the partnership – one that predates the 9-11 attacks.

It is the University of Florida, according to the Boston Globe report, that testifies to having the most significant collaboration with the FBI. There an officer is assigned full time to the Florida State Law Enforcement where he works with both the state police and the FBI.

New concerns about safety have entered the lives of foreign students as well. Since the terrorist attacks of 2001 student visa applications have been more difficult to attain, and new rules have been established demanding more information about students with visas. A computerized system for tracking foreign student will be implemented this month by the Immigration and Naturalization Service for all foreign students regardless of their school of choice or nationality.

Romney rescinds Board of Trustees appointments

By AMY O'NEILL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The appointment of University of Massachusetts alumnus Robert M. Mahoney to the UMass Board of Trustees was one of the 27 gubernatorial appointments cancelled by Governor Mitt Romney when he took office.

According to the Hampshire Gazette, Romney cancelled the appointments, which were made during the final 15 days of former Governor Jane Swift's tenure, because the positions, according to a statement released by Romney's chief of staff, "historically required the advice and consent of the governor's council."

Mahoney, who graduated from UMass in 1970, is vice chairman of Citizens Financial Group Inc. He was appointed to be a Trustee in 1997 and will continue to sit on the board until a replacement is appointed. A Springfield native, Mahoney is the chair of the Board's development committee and is co-chair of the UMass Foundation.

Robert Connolly, spokesman for the board, noted that Mahoney is recognized as an effective and energetic leader on the board.

"Bob Mahoney has served with great distinction since joining the UMass board of trustees," Connolly told the Gazette. "He has contributed much time and energy to the University's fund-raising efforts."

Connolly said that there is hope among the UMass trustees and UMass President William M. Bulger that Gov. Romney will reappoint Mahoney. Swift had already done so Dec. 19.

A spokeswoman for Romney said that he might appoint some of Swift's appointees after a review. At press time, Romney's assistant press secretary Nicole Si. Peter did not have a timeline available.

Other appointments cancelled by Romney include the trustees at the Massachusetts Maritime Academy, Quinsigamond Community College and Northern Essex Community College. Many others groups were affected by the actions, including the State Boxing Commission, the Juvenile Justice Advisory Committee, the Board of Registration in Embalming and Funeral Directing and the Holyoke Soldier's Home.

Swift's former press secretary, James Borghesani's appointment was cancelled as well.

Eight other appointments made by Swift in early 2002 are not at risk to be cancelled. A new governor has the right to withdraw nominations up to 15 days after they were made by his predecessor.

There are 17 total appointed trustees in addition to elected student trustees from each campus.

Chancellor reintroduces UMass seal

Students will be seeing the University of Massachusetts' "U" logo less and less on campus, according to Director of Marketing Kat Eldrid.

Eldrid said that the logo, originally created in 1998 for the Amherst campus, will be used less and less on campus in favor of the University of Massachusetts – Amherst seal that is found on a diploma.

"The seal that we have reflects the long history of the University... The chancellor wants to give UMass Amherst its own identity," Eldrid said. "It just represents the campus better."

Eldrid said that President William Bulger saw the "U" logo after the Amherst campus started using it and liked it, eventually applying it to the other University campuses.

According to Eldrid, the chancellor and administration involved are still at the very beginning of exploring how much the seal will be used over the "U" logo.

"Cost is a big factor," she said.

The center of the University of Massachusetts seal mirrors the state seal, which was adopted by Governor John Hancock and the Council in 1780, according to the Massachusetts state website. The center of the seal consists of a blue field with an Algonquin Native American dressed in a shirt and moccasins holding a bow and arrow.

A blue ribbon around the bottom of the shield on the seal is inscribed with the motto, "Ense petit placidam sub liberate quietem," meaning "By the sword we seek peace, but peace only under liberty."

The motto was written in about 1659 by Algernon Sydney, an English solider and politician. It can be found in the "Book of Mottoes" in Copenhagen, Denmark in the King's Library.

The Daily Collegian

TUESDAY, JANUARY 28, 2003 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXIII, ISSUE 1

To our Readership,

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian has undergone some major changes that we are unveiling with this issue. While retaining the coverage that has set our paper above other student papers, we have modified the overall appearance of The Collegian to better bring our content to you, the reader. With these changes we will be able to bring more content with a more accessible presentation.

On every page you will likely notice changes, both subtle and major. We welcome your feedback on any of the changes and appreciate any comments on how we can better serve the UMass, Amherst and Northampton areas.

You are welcome to call our newsroom at 545-1809 or email at news@dailycollegian.com with any comments.

Thank you for your continued support,

Matthew F. Sacco

Connector tunnel opened

First major component of Big Dig completed

By Jamie Loo
COLLEGIAN STAFF

An opening ceremony for the first phase of the Big Dig was held on Jan. 17 in a portion of the new tunnel in Boston.

Matthew J. Amorello, chairman of the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority, was the master of ceremonies.

"This achievement today could not have been attained without the dedication and intelligence of the men and women who arrived here during the blistering heat and on mornings just like this. We owe them all a great debt of gratitude," Amorello said.

The I-90 connector is the first part of the Big Dig to be opened. The tunnel opened to traffic on the afternoon on Jan. 20, but its true test came the next day during the morning commute. The Boston Globe reported that the commute had a few glitches involving the electronic signs, however it went fairly smoothly. The connector will extend the old MassPike at the I-90/I-93 interchange an extra 3.5 miles, leading to Logan International Airport.

The Big Dig is the largest civil works project in U.S. history, as well as being one of the most technically difficult and environmentally challenging. Construction began on the $14.7 billion project in 1991 and is expected to be completed in 2005.

Another part of the project replaces the six-lane elevated highway with an eight to ten lane underground expressway, alleviating northbound traffic on the current Central Artery. It will then end in a fourteen-lane, two- bridge crossing of the Charles River, which includes the Leonard P. Zakim Bunker Hill Bridge. This phase of the Big Dig is expected to be opened in March.

The project boasts many marvels, like the largest Integrated Operations Control Center (OCC). The OCC has features such as 400 cameras to monitor roads, 1,200 road sensors, computer-controlled ventilation buildings and 120 carbon monoxide sensors. The Amber Alert System, which has been used in other states to aid authorities in immediate kidnapping searches, will also be implemented on the roads. Over half of the 161 lane miles consist of tunnels, which won the British Construction Industry International Award in November 2002, the top award in Britain for international projects.

The ceremony featured several speakers, including Mayor Thomas Menino, Senate president Robert Travaglini and Robert Beal of the Artery Business Committee. The ceremony concluded with a traditional ribbon cutting.

Federal Highway Administrator Mary Peters brought greetings from Secretary of Transportation Norman Mineta and President George W. Bush. Peters said those in the Bush administration recognize that good transportation is essential to "security, economic prosperity and the quality of life." One of the top priorities at the Department of Transportation is to help decrease congestion on American transportation systems.

"The Big Dig is going to increase mobility, spur economic growth for Boston, for Massachusetts and in fact for the entire nation," Peters said. "There indeed a light at the end of the tunnel, and I congratulate you on your success."

Governor Mitt Romney said the project is a "tribute" to many of the great qualities of the people of the Massachusetts. Among these qualities he said the project was a feat of inventiveness on many different levels.

"Inventiveness to me is building a bridge that looks like a sculpture. Inventiveness is building a ventilation system, so powerful that if an automobile gasoline fire started inside one of the tunnels all that smoke could be sucked out immediately," said Romney.

Romney also praised the workers for rarely closing roadways and keeping transportation in the city moving during the past few years.

"In one of the greatest engineering feats of the modern world, we have tunneled through the earth and under the ocean," said Congressman Edward Markey.

Markey gave a crowd stirring, and often light-hearted speech about the Big Dig. Markey compared the scope of the project with that of the Panama Canal. The canal helped to speed up transportation in Central America, and at the opening ceremony in 1914, the slogan "the land united, the world united" was used. Markey said, the city of Boston can now claim a similar slogan, "the land divided, the city united."

"And while the United States gave back the Panama Canal, let everyone here be forth on quoted we will never, never give this tunnel back," Markey said.

Congressman Stephen Lynch spoke about how the Big Dig was a dangerous project, but that safety was a huge priority for the workers. Lynch read short biographies of three workers who had lost their lives during the building of the project and a moment of silence was observed in their memory. The project began way before his time, Lynch said and was worked on hard by his predecessors on Capitol Hill, the late Joe Moakley and Tip O'Neil.

"They're the ones that really did it all, and today Ed Markey and I, as elected officials on the podium, we stand on the shoulders of giants," Lynch said, "both of them helped get this project done."

Joseph Nigro, of the Boston Building Trades Council, praised workers for their tireless efforts on the project and for working hard to keep the city moving during the construction. Nigro named the building unions and companies who worked on the project. He also talked about the personal satisfaction of the individuals that physically helped to build it.

"Only in the construction industry do we share the end of the job. Layoffs and unemployment follow and we accept that. Pride and accomplishment also follows, and that is what we will tell our children, Nigro said. "We helped to build the largest public works project in the U.S.A and we helped to rebuild the city of Boston."

Senators say budget woes could affect UMass

By S.J. Port
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Newly elected Gov. Mitt Romney has requested that the state legislature grant him unilateral power over the state's necessary budget cuts. His proposals, however, do not include raising taxes, but may devastate local aid as well as further cut higher education line items.

Currently the 2003 fiscal year state budget has left the state with an eight percent deficit, according to State Senator Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst).

Rosenberg told faculty members at the final Faculty Senate meeting of the fall semester that "the figure that the [Gov. Romney Secretary of Administration and Finance Kriss] and [Legislative Director Gillespie] are bouncing around as remaining of the '03 fiscal problem is in the $500-800 million range."

Legislators and the Governor will have to make cuts in this range to balance this year's $23 billion state budget. Rosenberg believes the largest cuts will be made to higher education and local aid.

The state's constitution limits the governor's emergency powers to reduce spending to about 63 percent of the Commonwealth budget, mostly designated to areas of health and human services. Romney's administration is pressing the state legislature for cutting powers relating to the fourth quarter payments of local aid which includes cities and town as well as some public higher education accounts in the state budget.

Although Romney has said it could be necessary to cut local aid by $200 million, he has refused to reveal the scope if his proposed cuts unless he is given broader powers by the legislature. Romney's request inspired a response letter from newly re-elected Speaker of the House Thomas Finneran (D-Mattapan), who asked for details as to what Romney would cut if granted extended powers.

Rosenberg and fellow state Senator Michael Knapik (R-Westfield) told the Hampshire Gazette that they believe the Senate is likely to coincide with the House of Representatives decision to grant Romney the powers to unilaterally cut the budget. Regardless of the extent of cutting power Romney ends up with he is required to propose a budget by the end of February.

After he announces his proposed budget, the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees will hold their meeting to decide whether any additional tuition hike will be necessary for the fall semester. According to a spokesperson for UMass President William Bulger's office, the new governor is not being viewed as an enemy of higher education. Spokesperson Robert Connolly told the Hampshire Gazette that President Bulger has had several conversations with the new governor and is convinced that Romney understands the importance of the state university.

The only accounts generally immune to state budget cuts are those that receive equal federal funding, such as certain health-care programs.

A report in November by the National Governors Association stated that state budgets across the country are in the worst shape that they have been in since World War II. This has come largely because of increasing health-care costs and decreasing tax collections resulting from the slowed economy.

Tax collections are key to the Massachusetts budget woes due to the rollback on income taxes begun several years ago. Romney has voted not to support a freeze or reversal of that rollback which will work to roll income taxes back to five percent by next year.

Romney has stated multiple times that he does not see raising taxes as a solution to the state's fiscal concerns.

"The easy way to fix any problem is to go to the people and say you have to pay more money, but that's not what the job of management is," Romney said in his inaugural speech. "The job of management is to find ways to permanently and structurally change the costs of our structure such that we can have a balanced budget without always raising taxes every time people think there's a need."

Romney proposed to restructure state government and cut or eliminate non-essential programs to lessen the budget shortfall of fiscal year 04.

"I will bring forward proposals that will shape state government for the realities of our new century," Romney said in his inaugural speech. "They will call for a greater level of responsiveness to our citizens, faster decision-making, a lighter more agile bureaucracy."

"And an openness to change. I will bring forward a new vision for growing our economy and communities, for higher education, for fixing failing schools and for providing health and social services," he said.

The state last quarter decided to push through legislation to charge pharmacies $36 million to help pay for state Medicaid prescription programs, which the pharmacies in turn handed over to their customers in the form of a $1.50 tax, begun on Jan. 1, on all prescriptions. The Legislature's plan to have pharmacies lessen the burden and free up money for other accounts-or more likely so that other state programs would see fewer cuts has been transformed into exactly what Romney has promised to work without- additional or higher taxes.

At the last Faculty Senate meeting last semester, Senator Ronald Chilton asked Senator Rosenberg what it would take for Romney to consider raising taxes as a way to help the state out of its debt. Rosenberg replied that many people in the Legislature are already discussing this as an option and that he hoped Romney will "at some point realize that a balanced approach to solving the fiscal crisis would be fair and reasonable and that citizens of the Commonwealth have been historically willing to support such an approach."

Rosenberg told the Faculty Senate that the only other serious discussions happening in the Legislature currently center on the expansion of legalized gambling in the state.

"That would mean slot machines at racetracks and casinos," said Rosenberg at the time. "That will not close the two billion dollar hole Gov. Elect Romney has yet to give any indication that he would consider any tax increases."

"He feels we can manage and cut our way out of this by getting rid of inefficiency, waste, fraud, and abuse and programs that are no longer needed. Hard to imagine you can find two billion dollars worth of that or even one billion, but that's his goal: to solve the problem without raising any taxes," he said.

Faculty Senate Secretary Ernest May asked Rosenberg if Romney had given any indication as to how he would handle lessening the blow of budget cuts to public higher education. Rosenberg replied by saying that there is a "three-page list of themes for higher education, the most significant proposals being tuition retention and the closing and merging of campuses at the state college level," but that the Governor's plans remain vague and obscure and therefore difficult to understand.

Rosenberg explained to Faculty Senate members the general process of budget revision in times of recession and laid out how he sees the state progressing through the economic bottoming-out of the past two years.

"You may recall, those of you who were here to witness it ten years ago, that the last fiscal crisis lasted four years. If you look at what's happened so far in the roughly two years of this fiscal crisis, we have cut every discretionary program to some extent and most of them rather severely already," said Rosenberg.

"Cuts done by the Legislature total about 1.6 billion. The governor [at the time Jane Swift] has done about $260 million cuts unilaterally now, so it's bringing it up to about $1.8 million," he said. "We're only in the second year of the fiscal crisis, and we cut 50,000 people off of health insurance. So, what took us until the third year to get to, we're doing in the second year. Next year you can count on some very serious cuts to local aid. This year we just nibbled around the edge. Next year, you'll start seeing reports of cuts that are going to range between 10 and 20 percent."

Holyoke Community College President David Bartley (a former speaker of the House) told the Hampshire Gazette that he predicts tuition and fee increases across the state's higher educational system, and said that they are in the form of tuition increases but might as well be raised taxes.

"Are there going to be higher education cuts? Sure. We have to share the burden. We will have a tax increase. We call it a rise in tuition and fees, but they are nothing more than tax increases. Use whatever subtleties you want," said Bartley.

Bartley added that the most important safeguard for publicly funded higher education during times of fiscal crisis is for colleges to remain separate line items in the budget. This directly conflicts with Romney's goal of efficient state administrative organization and his argument for making higher education a single line item.

Knapik summed up the feeling of many in the state when he told the Hampshire Gazette, "We have great hopes, great desires, great ambitions and great empathy. But we have no money."

Snow removal strains budget

By Dan Lamothe
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A number of large snowstorms over winter break have left the region on a pace to break the record for yearly snowfall in the region and have caused problems throughout western Massachusetts and at the University of Massachusetts.

According to the National Weather Service, about 40 inches of snow have already been dumped on Amherst, putting a crunch on both space and snow removal budgets.

The amount of snow has been an issue, according to Jack Rogala, head of Grounds Services. He said that heavy amounts of snow cause problems by shrinking parking lots.

"We run into the situation where we have no alternatives but to take up spaces in the parking lots [with snow]," Rogala said.

The second problem that the University faces with large amounts of snowfall is the amount of cars in the parking lot. Unlike many places, cars typically stay in parking lots while the University is being plowed, Rogala said.

"It'd be nice if parking lots were clear when we plowed, but that's just not the way things work here," he said.

Rogala said that the amount of time that it has taken to clean up after each storm has varied. "Each storm varies depending on the number of pieces [of equipment] used to clean it up," he said. Rogala estimated that for each inch of snow that falls with a storm, it takes 30 man-days to clean up after it completely.

According to Rogala, about 60 Grounds Service employees are involved in cleaning up each bigger-sized storm, with the custodial staff cleaning up the entranceways to buildings separately.

In terms of raw numbers, Grounds Services has already used substantial amounts of de-icing agent and salt. Rogala said that 500 tons of salt and 7,000 gallons of Ice B'Gone-M50, a liquid de-icer, have been used to keep roads and walkways safe and dry. This does not include any agents used on any University parking lots, which are cleared separately by contractors at Carl's Excavating.

Much of the snow removed from walks and roads at UMass has been deposited at the back of the large yellow lot near the Mullins Center. The massive pile of snow has grown by the storm, with bulldozers pushing additional snow up the pile as winter progresses. Rogala said that without the bulldozers, there wouldn't be enough room in the lot by now for all of the cars.

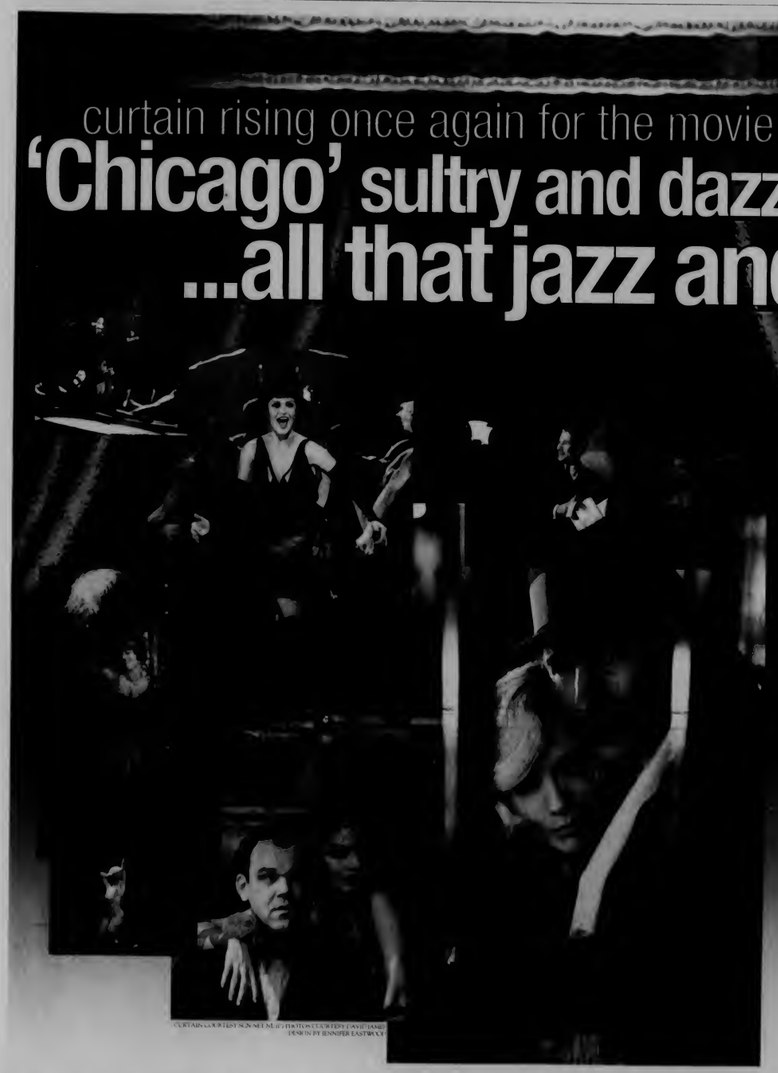
The Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency [MEMA] issued a roof collapse alert for the Commonwealth as a result of the large amounts of snowfall. According to Agency Director Stephen J. McGrail, "The recent rain, in some areas, has been absorbed by the accumulated snow still piled high on roofs increasing the stress on some structures."

"It is important to try to minimize the amounts of snow present on roofs," he said.

MEMA warned to keep an eye on large accumulations of snow build-up and drifts and to watch out for large icicles.

"Icicles overhanging walkways can be dangerous and should be carefully removed," a release by the agency said.

Workers have been bulldozing snow removed from campus up this snow bank in the back right corner of the yellow lot next to Parking Services.



Workers relocate snow to avoid a parking crunch.

curtain rising once again for the movie musical

'Chicago' sultry and dazzling... ...all that jazz and more

Despite the near overnight success of last year's "Moulin Rouge," film studios were still somewhat precautious of rejuvenating the movie-musical genre. After all, the musical aspect of "Moulin" consists of a composition of popular tunes like The Police's "Roxanne" and Elton John's "Your Song" – ones audiences could easily identify with.

However, more often than not, the general movie-going public is unfamiliar with show tunes, unless you're talking about a classic like "Grease." It therefore makes some sense that the next logical step in recreating the movie musical would be with "Chicago." The show has already a built-in audience from its powerhouse Broadway run (and subsequent world tours), and it resembles "Moulin" on many levels – a glitzy, razzle-dazzle, sequins and confetti feel to it.

'Chicago'
Directed by Rob Marshall
Starring Catherine Zeta-Jones, Renee Zellweger, Richard Gere
Miramax
113 mins.

Getting "Chicago" to the screen, however, must have been a laborious task, the stage show has hardly any dialogue between musical numbers and uses a bare-bones, nondescript set. This is all well and good for Broadway audiences, but moviegoers require more. Look at 1996's adaptation of Andrew Lloyd Webber's rock opera "Evita," which left many audiences unfamiliar with the show, saying, "It was too much music."

But "Chicago" does not suffer the same problem. In fact, a few songs included in the original stage show, like "When Velma Takes the Stand" and "Class," have been lopped out of the movie version (although the latter tune does appear on the soundtrack to the film). The songs left are masterfully arranged by Paul Bogaev and given to a delightful and talented ensemble of stars. A new song, "I Move On," written specifically for the movie, is a pleasant addition that blends into the score, even though it can only be heard playing over the closing credits.

As for the film's vocal talent, who would've thought Richard Gere could actually sing and dance? And yet he pulls off one of the best performances of his career, as lawyer Billy Flynn. Not only does he hit all the notes (including the extremely high ones in the endearing song "All I Could the legacy of Detective Alex Cross be winding down?

By Jake D. Lewis
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The most amazing thing about reading an Alex Cross mystery, such as the new episode "Four Blind Mice," is how author James Patterson continually manages to weave fascinating stories from the simplest of plots. There's always some serial killer in his books; Detective Cross goes after the bad guy, and the plot usually tops off with a twist the reader should've seen coming much earlier, making one often wanting to kick himherself for not being able to solve the uncomplicated mystery alone and trying to understand why such a straightforward story is so enjoyable. Patterson's books won't be studied in English classes or book clubs, but they are an addictive pleasure for readers, usually never disappointing and short to boot.

'Four Blind Mice'
By James Patterson
Little Brown & Co.

Not to say Patterson knocks them out of the park each and every time, but In "Four Blind Mice," he has made another grand slam, and one can clearly see Patterson is trying to steer the series in a new direction.

Though not yet specifically defined, the changes will either phase out Cross' character, who has been the protagonist readers have grown to love throughout the years, or bring the collection to a close. The latter makes much sense, as Patterson has shown his versatility at writing other characters, having recently begun the "San Francisco Series," where his crime fighters are women lawyers in the Bay area, as well as other thrillers independent of Detective Cross and a few romance novels.

In the latest installment, Cross announces his police force retirement plans, as foreshadowed in last year's "Violets Are Blue." He further considers taking a position with the FBI, who helped him in the aforementioned case, but when his live-in aunt (who's more like a mother to him) Nana Mama starts to get sick.

The Stones rocking and rolling into Beantown

By Matthew Despres
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BOSTON – They're still The Stones. No introductions necessary.

Tailoring their legend to the "intimate" confines of the FleetCenter, the Rolling Stones again defied age and reason on Jan. 12, the fourth Boston stop on the "LICKS World Tour." Brashly ignoring their waning studio relevance, the band instead proudly placed its hand face-up on the table – a flush of radio hits and cultural touchstones – and made them ring with a relevance that showed the song remains the same only if complacency gets to it first.

It hasn't, at least onstage. Guitarist Keith Richards materialized and greased the night's engine with the one-two punch of "You Got Me Rocking" and "Start Me Up," each of which found Sir Mick Jagger arching his frame in ways a mortal half his age could only approach with reluctance. At 59, he struts the line of self-parody, particularly in front of the eternally proper Charlie Watts, though Jagger ultimately gave in to good taste on the bruising "Monkey Man" and "Stray Cat Blues," the crowd roaring with approval and Jagger, ever the lester, obliging them happily.

The group struck more poignantly though when Jagger reigned in his flair and let the songs do the strutting. "No Expectations" effectively slid between the night's brighter numbers, while "Sympathy For the Devil" still haunts as a primal declaration of dark interaction; both showcase a young Jagger's foresight into the mind of the aging icon he has become.

'Friends' alive and well; Bee Gee buys the farm; Potter annoucing his return

'Friends' Forever?

They'll do their best for us another season. Just when we thought it was the last season of "Friends," NBC has reeled in the sextet for a 10th season. Though its writers had already been discussing plots for a final episode, "Friends" will return next year with its cast intact, Variety reported. NBC and the show's producers at Warner Bros. reached a deal that will bring back the six stars for 18 episodes. At $10 million per half-hour episode, the 10th season of "Friends" will be the most costly primetime show ever.

The blockbuster agreement was developed to aid "quality-of-life" concerns for the cast members. Jennifer Aniston was particularly reluctant to sign a contract for a full season, largely because of her increasingly complicated movie career. The cast will continue to earn the same $1 million salary per episode. And, like we didn't see this part coming, NBC has said the next season will be the last.

The Fantasy's Over

Lucian Grainge, the Sony Music chief announced that he is stepping down from the music giant he's run since 1988. Most of Grainge's responsibility for making stars out of Mariah Carey (whom he married and later divorced) Jennifer Lopez, Celine Dion and Ricky Martin, while orchestrating successful comebacks from fabled stars such as Bob Dylan and Bruce Springsteen.

The news comes at a time when the record industry, and Sony in particular, are running scared. Since Mottola, 52, assumed the helm of chief executive, Sony has slipped from second to third in market share among the big five labels. Mottola has been in the headlines just about as much as his label's stars. Carey accused him of stealing her musical and stylistic ideas and giving them to Sony's newest diva, Lopez. The Dixie Chicks made public their accusation that Sony had cheated them out of royalties, though a threatened suit and countersuit were settled out of court. Last summer Michael Jackson outdid the aforementioned by calling Mottola a racist and a devil for allegedly underpromoting Jackson's poor-selling "Invincible," even though Sony had spent a reported $30 million to promote the CD.

Mottola reportedly had two years to go on his contract, which paid him an estimated $10 million a year, but instead of staying on as chief executive, he'll now be running his own imprint within Sony, one in which he hopes to combine talent management with recording deals, concert promotion, and online sales.

Andrew Lack, former president and chief operating officer of NBC, was announced as Mottola's replacement. Lack is a surprising choice given that he has no music business background.

'Stayin' Alive'

Maurice Gibb, who sang with his brothers in the Bee Gees for more than 40 years, died Jan. 12 at age 53 at Mount Sinai Medical Center in Miami. According to a statement by the hospital, he had been hospitalized days prior to his death following a seizure at home and suffered cardiac arrest Thursday during surgery to remove an intestinal blockage.

The singer's family is questioning the medical care Gibb received. "The fact that they had to operate on Maurice during the shock of cardiac arrest is very questionable, and we will pursue every factor, every element, every second of the timeline of the final hours of Maurice's life," brother Barry Gibb told the BBC. "That will be our quest from now on."

Over the course of their career, the British-born Bee Gees sold 120 million albums. The remaining members of the band have stated that the band will continue to make music.

Cowabunga!

Fox has renewed "The Simpsons" for another two seasons. That ensures that the long-running animated family satire will make it through a 16th season and edge past "The Adventures of Ozzie & Harriet" to become the longest-running comedy in TV history. Fox has also renewed "King of the Hill" for another season, its eighth.

Muggles Rejoice!

After three years of waiting, Bloomsbury Publishing finally has a completed manuscript of J.K. Rowling's fifth Harry Potter novel, "Harry Potter and the Order of the Phoenix," which will be published in America by Scholastic Books, will be out June 21.

The new installment will be even longer than the last book "Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire," coming in at 38 chapters and 255,000 words.

Less than 24 hours after the June publication date was announced, "Order of the Phoenix" became the top-selling book on Amazon.com.

New Year's resolutions of the rich and famous

Sounding Off
Nikolas Markantonatos

In Hollywood, looks can be deceiving. Most stars look like they have everything and then some, but taking a closer looks dictates otherwise –which is why I've put forth my third annual Hollywood resolutions list to help stars improve themselves.

Jennifer Love Hewitt resolves to... disappear.

Music artists resolve to ditch the overused formula of hiring rap artists for every song (etc. Ashanti, L.L., Mariah Carey).

Vin Diesel resolves to stop pretending he is Hollywood's greatest hero.

Whitney Houston resolves to stop making a fool of herself. It's not right, and it's not okay!

Jennifer Lopez resolves to loosen her grip as a media whore.

Bloated millionaire hopeful Anna Nicole Smith resolves to take her big busted self into a windowless steel chamber... forever.

Russell Crowe resolves to lose his bully persona.

Tom Green resolves to face the facts: your 15 minutes of fame are up, loser!

The Rock resolves to never make another movie again.

R. Kelly resolves to keep his hands to himself.

It was fun while it lasted, but music stars resolve to drop the extra "r."

Courtney Love resolves to stay away from acting.

Hollywood resolves to continue making warm ethnic comedies a la "My Big Fat Greek Wedding."

Movie studios resolve to stop giving deceiving titles to horrible movies ("XXX").

The music biz resolves to drop album and concert ticket prices.

Boy band members resolve to stop going solo in what most of the time only ends up becoming an embarrassing move.

Martha Stewart resolves to work on her own image before working on a number of her other projects.

"American Idol" winner Kelly Clarkson resolves to sing better songs than the drippy "A Moment Like This."

Kid Rock resolves to stop acting like he's an important music star.

Ben Affleck resolves to abandon fiancee Jennifer Lopez before he embarrasses himself anymore.

Winona Ryder resolves to avoid using the five finger discount.

Music stars resolve to stop singing about being chased by tabloid reporters and paparazzi. (Hey, you're the ones that decided to step into the spotlight!)

Audiences resolve to stop going to see crappy flicks ("Scooby-Doo," "XXX").

Music stars resolve to crossover to movie stars – a trend that's becoming more and more sad each passing time.

Michael Jackson resolves to... oh, there's too many to list!

Christina Aguilera resolves to ditch her slutty image.

Lance Bass resolves to ditch his plans to fly into space; your momma doesn't want to see you anyway!

'Fight Club' author back in the ring

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

Imagine a poem that, once recited, would immediately make the person it's directed at drop dead right on the spot. In "Lullaby," the new novel by "Fight Club" author Chuck Pahlaniuk, our narrator Carl Streator is a newspaper reporter who stumbles across a death poem while researching a story on sudden infant death syndrome. All the deceased children had the same book in the rooms, open to the same page with this lethal "culling song" on it. Unbeknownst to him, Streator subconsciously commits it to memory and finds he becomes a helpless serial killer when his mind happens to think of the lines. He sets off on a cross-country trek to destroy all copies of this book with a real estate broker named Helen Hoover Boyle, who makes a career off of selling haunted houses to unsuspecting families. Along for the ride are Boyle's secretary Mona Sabbat, who prefers to go by her Wiccan name, Mulberry, and her con-artist boyfriend, Oyster.

'Lullaby'
By Chuck Pahlaniuk
Doubleday

If you've read Pahlaniuk before, you know it's not like any other literary experience. Writing in fragmented phrases, repeated mantras and a heavy usage of black humor, his little books feel like big novels at times with all the messages they're trying to relate – sometimes subtly, sometimes not. While the overall idea of the novel is that ultimate power breeds evil, he also includes subplots on eco-terrorism, censorship and religious persecution. Sometimes it gets to be a little heavy-handed, with Pahlaniuk throwing so much your way it's hard to keep up, but he generally keeps things fast-paced, entertaining and fresh.

Back in the story, while the characters make their U.S.-wide journey to rid the Earth of the remaining 27 copies of the killer book, the fight over good and evil emerges. At first, they all agreed this power should be destroyed, but as time goes on, Streator and his colleagues clash over the idea of keeping this extreme energy in their hands. At the same time, they stumble across a volume that can do more positive things: immortality and raising the dead, love spells, body switching and so on. With this in hand, a love story evolves between Boyle and Streator. Has he had this spell cast on him by Boyle in attempt for her to be able to get her way and keep the "culling song" power, or does he actually love her?

Further, is it actually Boyle that he's fallen in love with, or merely the person with whom she has temporarily switched bodies with? Finally, how does our hero know Boyle won't use the death lullaby on him, so she can sell more haunted houses? All these amusing issues are kept at a lighthearted level and never become anything more philosophical than its face value. Here, Pahlaniuk leaves the reader to draw his own opinions instead of preaching what he thinks, a vast change (and grand improvement) over his prior novel "Choke," which tended to be somewhat more complex than one would like.

"Lullaby" may very well be the next best Pahlaniuk novel to follow up the movie version of his "Fight Club." It has the same tone of inspired yet thought-provoking lunacy and enough action to fit well on a big screen. There are even special effects that can be implemented, like a face that appears in bathtub water or the strangely unerotic love-making scene in a glass chandelier. Regardless, by itself, "Lullaby" keeps your imagination going at full-tilt, only stopping for a breath when you reach the back cover.

James Patterson's latest novel top of the line

his life is put on hold. For the first time, Cross realizes his priorities should be with family and not his job. To further prove the point, his son, Damon, begins getting caught in a street gang, and a new romance with a fellow detective blossoms, although Cross fears that she may fall to the same peril as his last girlfriend did (a few books ago).

Just as much a family member is Cross partner, John Sampson, who convinces Cross to help him in "one last case," (a role reversal). Sampson's friend, Ellis Cooper, a Sergeant in the Army, has been framed for three murders and is awaiting execution. The clock is ticking to exonerate the imprisoned man, but can Cross and Sampson do it in time? As evidence that "Four Blind Mice" is less about Cross than most previous books in the series, there is a greater concentration on Sampson's relationship with Ellis, and the start of a romantic relationship for him too. If Patterson is trying to shift the series to center on Sampson, then he's doing it gracefully and honestly. This is the most emotion am reader has seen Sampson display in all the Cross mysteries, and I can't help but to think there's a significant reason.

The army seems as good a target as any to focus on this time around, since the United States stands in wartime positions with its foreign neighbors. Like other political and military thrillers, "Four Blind Mice" doesn't make our protectors always look like the nicest of guys, but it's a subject many find intriguing. And when that inevitable twist rolls around at the end of this novel, Patterson has skillfully tied in some psychology to make its details more plausible.

"Four Blind Mice" does not end the Cross saga, nor totally change directions. Cross does, however, decide about his career choice and makes the new relationship more definitive, but Patterson still has points to address forthwith. I forewarn, if you are to read "Four Blind Mice," avoid looking at the very last sentence until you've read all before it. In that crucial moment Alex Cross readers have come to love again and again, you are left with that same nagging feeling for finding out what happens next. Patterson has marked a new chapter in his career as a writer, and I can't wait to see where he'll go from here.

Classic role playing game to intrigue the senses; Japan's 'Arc the Lad' reaches the United States

By Reid Davenport
Collegian Staff

Once in a while, an overlooked game from afar reaches the States only to be quickly tossed into the used games section of Electronics Boutique, never to be heard of again. However, one company has been able to produce games of old technologically and still advanced in capability to grab a gamer's attention. Working Designs has brought Sony PlayStation players the excellent role playing games (RPGs for short) "Luna: The Silver Star Story" and "Luna 2." Now, they've done it again by bringing in one of the most popular RPGs in Japan, "Arc the Lad Collection."

'Arc the Lad Collection'
Playstation
Publisher Working Designs
Developer Arc Development
RPG

This game created a big deal for Working Designs, as it was originally intended for release with the original Sony PlayStation. However, due to problems with importing from Japan and translation, it was never able to reach the States until last year. The original idea was simply to release "Arc the Lad 3" to the States, but the company felt it wouldn't be right to shove gamers into the final installment of the trilogy without the story's background. So they came up with the collection of games so U.S. gamers could get a look at the story behind "Arc the Lad."

This set of four games in six disks is not a graphical masterpiece for this era, but it has possibly one of the greatest storylines since

"Final Fantasy X." The game even has a "Final Fantasy III"-look in parts one and two with a battle mode closely resembling "Final Fantasy Tactics." The plot gets more and more intriguing as gamers go from disk to disk. One common misconception is that you play as the hero, Arc, in all three games, but that is simply not true. Instead, you get to still follow Arc's adventures, while also going though another hero's story. Eventually you cross paths with Arc along the way, which makes this set very addicting, as you want to know the ending.

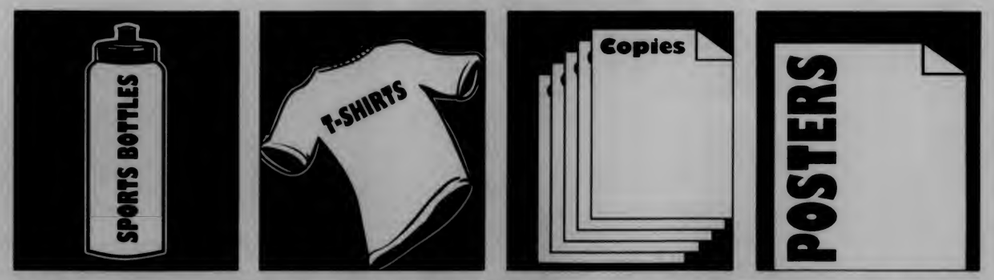
While the actual game itself is only three parts, the collection also includes "Arc the Lad: Monster Tournament" and "The Making of Arc the Lad." Both are better played after finishing the three parts as they may reveal certain things otherwise. Another addition to this monster collection includes stand-up cards for all of the characters in the game, an "Arc the Lad" memory card case, a hard cover instruction manual and rubber analogue stick covers. While some of these prove random, it's nice a gaming company put something extra into its package.

The package totals in more than 100 hours of game play, and while it retail prices around $70, the amount of game time will outweigh the cost. But be warned, the "Arc the Lad Collection" is one of the most addictive RPGs a gamer will ever play. Just to be safe, you may want to have a chaperone, so you're not stuck in front of a video game for a week, month or even year.

Snapshots of American pop-culture

'MTV Photobooth'
By Various Photographers
Universe Publishing

MTV's popular show "TRL" has for years been a necessary stop for celebrities working the talk show circuit promoting their latest projects. Located in New York's Times Square, "TRL" has attracted some huge name stars, including Madonna, Ben Affleck and Arnold Schwarzenegger. Along with their visit, stars pose in a shopping mall type photobooth for a four-picture photo shoot.



"MTV Photobooth" ($17.95 retail) collects together for the first time the compilation of photos of more than 200 celebrities' shots from famed photo booth. Flipping through the book, one quickly realizes how "TRL" has served as the barometer of white-hot stars in their prime: Backstreet Boys and Hanson in 1999 and Vitamin C (remember her?) in 2000.

The biggest debit of the 7-inch by 7-inch paperback is the was some pictures are blown up to full-page dimensions that end up making the photos look cloudy and distorted. The book would have been spruced up if some behind-the-scenes stories on the guests were included. In fact, the only text in the book is a brief one-paragraph introduction.

One of the rare things that make "MTV Photobooth" unique, however, is that stars were shot without the guidance of an army of handlers directing their every pose and move. Some of the celebs look unsatisfied or frustrated, possessed with forced expressions. As a result, onlookers get to see a cross-eyed Janet Jackson, a nose-picking Julia Stiles and a butt-hearing Usher.

'Lord of the Rings' Towers over the winter box office

By Lizzy Nielsen
Collegian Staff

Sometimes when movies stray from the books they are based on, hopeful visions of a story's grand potential shatter. "The Two Towers," the second movie in the "Lord of the Rings" trilogy, does stray a bit further from J.R.R. Tolkien's original intentions than the first movie did, but this fantasy tale does an unbelievable job at the daunting task of creating the beauty and wonder that is Middle Earth.

When we left the hobbits at the end of "Fellowship of the Ring," the Fellowship had been broken. Bormir is dead, and Frodo (Elijah Wood) and Sam (Sean Astin) have been separated from the rest of the group in order to pursue the journey to Mordor to destroy the ring. Legolas (Orlando Bloom), Aragorn (Viggo Mortensen) and Gimli (John Rhys-Davies) meanwhile set out to find their captured hobbit friends, Merry (Dominic Monaghan) and Pippin (Billy Boyd).

In the beginning of "The Two Towers," Frodo senses he and Sam are not alone. In enters Gollum (voiced by Andy Serkis), one of the previous owners of the ring, an object he refers to as his "precious." Gollum, a.k.a. Smeagol, proceeds to steal the entire show, proving much comic relief with his schizophrenic outbursts throughout the movie.

Cut to Merry and Pippin, lost in Fangorn Forest where they are captured by a large, talking, treelike object called an ent, named Treebeard (voiced by John Rhys-Davies), who brings them back to the supposed reincarnation of Gandalf (Ian McKellen) as the White Wizard.

Gollum, who was quite a frightening character in the first book and movie, transforms his image in the second film to a sort of loveable and misguided character. Gollum forms a special relationship with Frodo when Frodo refers to him as Smeagol, Gollum's name before the ring possessed him. Throughout the entire movie, Gollum and Smeagol battle over which personality is going to persevere, which is going to determine the fate of Frodo and Sam. Sam doesn't trust Gollum/Smeagol, and it develops a bit of conflict between Frodo and Sam.

The movie is breathtakingly beautiful. The Battle at Helm's Deep was visually captivating, and the darkness and immense size of Saruman's army at the doorstep of Helm's Deep is a masterwork of special effects. However, the special effect that stole the show was Gollum/Smeagol. The ability to make Gollum appear both frightening and loveable and the ability of the actors to spend such a significant amount of screen time with a relatively nonexistent character, as both Wood and Astin had to do.

The acting is convincing, as Wood continues to shine as the tortured and conflicted Frodo, and Astin keeps Samwise Gamgee as insightful and lovable as he was in the first installment of the trilogy. All the old faces return to the silver screen. However, the show is stolen by the computer generated Gollum, who is probably the most complex character in this particular part of the saga.

Even still, the script definitely has some weak parts and is considerably slow for an extended period of time at the beginning. However, the stunning graphics and costuming was typically enough distraction for a viewer to remain attentive.

The most common complaint about the second installment of this trilogy was the lack of attention placed on details from the book, and the inconsistencies from print to screen. For example, Farimir (David Wenham) in the movie is evil and possessive and holds Frodo and Sam prisoner, while in the novel, Farimir makes a point to say he is not like his brother and allows Frodo and Sam to continue on their journey. Quickbeam was also completely left out of the story, although he should have been as he led the hobbits from the entmoot. The ents also decide they are going to go to war in the book, while in the movie, they journey to the west side of their forest, see what Sarumon has done to the other trees and then strike Isengard.

Nonetheless, as the plot weaves onward, music aids in capturing the perfect moment. Howard Shore composes a dazzling soundtrack that helps capture the drama, emotion and suspense in "The Two Towers." The music is both time-appropriate and beautiful, and the soundtrack (with a list price of $19.98) is well worth the cost.

The important part of viewing "The Two Towers" is realizing you are viewing a director's interpretation of a beloved novel. The movie stops before the end of the second book's plot, possibly because the third installment, "The Return of the King," is a considerably shorter book than the first two.

All packaged together, "The Two Towers," entertaining and visually spectacular, offers audiences three hours of wit, drama and excitement.

'Drumline.' There's something to be said about a movie that immediately makes you want to go out and learn something new. "Drumline" is pretty much "Top Gun" in the marching band, but it captures the striking, precise beauty of the band with its movements fall in procession with the music. The film is as rousing as one could hope a holiday-timed entertainment could be.

Devon (Nick Cannon), a hot-shot drummer from Harlem, wins a scholarship to a prestigious Southern college and immediately butts heads with a straight arrow senior (Leonard Roberts, credibly angry), and the traditionalist coach (Orlando Jones) who prefers the tones of Earth, Wind and Fire over today's modern hip-hop cadences. Yes, "Drumline" is one of those movies – Devon must overcome his ego and learn to play with the band. But director Charles Stone III turns the images of the bands on the field into true visual fireworks.

The marching band performances are spectacles of awesome showmanship. Drum sticks dart and fly with the fluidity of hummingbirds, white gloves flashing with blinding speed, and the performers move along with the thumping percussive rhythms with the precision of an elite military unit. The drumming scenes are pure, exhilarating pop thrills. Cannon nicely straddles the line between likable and arrogant, while Jones shows some real dramatic force as a teacher with a few things to learn himself.

"Drumline" never quite escapes the neighborhood of conventional storytelling, but it's hard to find storytelling as funny, foxy and with as much rhythm as this.

'The Wild Thornberrys Movie.' The animated flick does a great service to novices of the Thornberrys' TV show by explaining the backbone of the show in a few elegant gestures. Eliza Thornberry (voiced with sweet-toned, little-girl-ishness by Lacey Chabert) is the spunky, freckled preteen daughter of a Steve Irwin-like adventurer from jolly old England (he's voiced, with comical nasality, by Tim Curry.) Together the family – including the camera-wielding mother, disaffected teenage daughter, a wild child adoptee named Donnie and a stuffy Brit-accented chimp called Darwin – traverse the globe looking show a very "Crocodile Hunter"-esque TV series.

Unbeknownst to her family, Eliza can also talk with the animals. "The Wild Thornberrys Movie" is a one-year-too-late animated cash in that still has a few moments of daft amusement (Eliza's sister reads a magazine entitled "Teenage Wasteland.") "The Wild Thornberrys" isn't brilliant in the way that some recent animated family films, ranging from the computer animated ("Ice Age") to the hand drawn ("Lilo and Stitch") have been. There are the requisite celebrity voices (Rupert Everett, Marisa Tomei) and kid-geared jokes about baboon behinds; there just isn't enough for an adult to clue into. The plot, in which Eliza sets out to stop a team of poachers

A new side to Nicholson triumphing in box offices

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

It's hard to believe underneath that loose skin, receding hairline and glossed-over eyes, there's the same man who, a long time ago, hacked through a hotel doorway with a pickaxe, yelling "Here's Johnny!" or, more recently, threw a dog down a laundry shoot. Yes, it's not the same (psychotic) Jack Nicholson we've come to love over the years, but there's something about his portrayal of Warren R. Schmidt in the new film "About Schmidt" that we haven't seen so far in his career.

I fear people will go to see this movie with the mind frame that it's a comedy, but just like Schmidt, this movie's about more than what's on the surface.

Alexander Payne, who last directed and co-wrote the skeeper hit "Election," which also had more meat to it than as one first perceives, here brings us into the life of Schmidt, a recently-retired insurance agent, who begins to question the meaning of his life. "Who is this old woman living in my house?" he asks about his wife in an inner-monologue. He yearns to be closer with his daughter, Jeannie (Hope Davis), who's engaged to a goofball waterbed salesman, Randall (Dermot Mulroney), a real "nincompoop" according to Warren. Case in point, when Randall attends a wake for a woman he's only met once, he breaks the somber mood by looking up and addressing the Heavens, calling out her name. As much as the viewers tries, he agrees with Warren; he feels bad for Randall and partially Jeannie, because they're both so clueless about how they look when they're with each other.

So after an epiphany, Warren sets off in his Winnebago to make the most out of the time he has left. He visits his childhood home, which no longer exists, and then his alma mater, where the students think he is a walking definition of un-cool. He journeys to a museum that only has ancient arrowheads, too. Talk about having no direction in life, his daughter Jeannie doesn't even want him to come to Denver a few days before the wedding. We agree with the woman in the trailer park who phrases it quite simply when she says, "Inside, you're a sad man."

Besides the viewer, the only person who really learns about Schmidt is a boy that Warren "adopts" from one of those Save-A-Kid foundations you see on TV. Warren corresponds with Ndugu, the six-year-old Tanzanian boy he sponsors, and unfolds all the goings-on in his life. It's very unlikely that Ndugu would be interested, let alone understand, what

Spielberg's ode to the fun and quick-witted

Leonardo DiCaprio returns to the silver screen with a perfect blend of emotion and amusement

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

Steven Spielberg's "Catch Me If You Can" opens with a swank animated credits sequence, and from there the movie wraps you up in its breezy, blithe amorality.

"Catch Me" is one of those movies that treats its depictions of criminal mischief as if they were airy celebrations of the high-wire ingenuity of the con. The hero is a con man who assumes various identities and forges millions of dollars worth of checks, yet he does it with such casual ease that the movie practically billboards buckster-ism as the career of choice for the restless and charming.

Frank Abagnale Jr. managed to successfully pose as a doctor, lawyer and airline pilot and cash-in $2.5 million in fraudulent checks – all before his 19th birthday. It sounds like a joke, or a too-good-to-be-true story, but the miraculous part is that it is entirely true.

Spielberg's film, as Spielberg films must, says that the root of Abagnale's troubles stemmed from his parents' divorce when he was 16 (broken families are a popular theme for the director). His father was a rapscallion store-owner indebted to the IRS, but unable to use his quicksilver patter to charm the bank owners into lending him money. The Abagnales had to move into a cramped apartment, sell their ritzy car and soon Frank Jr. catches his mother having an affair with his dad's best friend.

There are signs that Frank not only inherited his father's verbal shuffle, but that he refined and perfected it. When he transfers to a public school, he manages to convince a French class that he's the new substitute – for a week – as he assigns homework, partakes in a parent-teacher conference and even plans a field trip. As his family leaves the school, Frank's father doesn't reprimand him, but gives him an encouraging smile.

When his parents announce their divorce, Frank runs away rather than choose between them. Unable to get respect

Despite her vocal ability, Shemekia fails to impress

Shemekia Copeland sings with passion, but her performance still needs some polishing.

By Chris Flouton-Barnes
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON – Young blues belter Shemekia Copeland returned to the Pioneer Valley Dec. 14 with an act polished to the point of transparency. Scattering through a dozen songs from her three albums with Alligator Records, Copeland's set was formulaic and stale, lacking the ferocity and spunk of this talented singer's capabilities.

This is not to say Copeland delivered a sub-par musical performance; her voice was in fine form throughout the night, forcefully muscular at one moment and achingly bare the next. Her touring band, a crack outfit excelling at transitioning between solo and ensemble playing, still something added to the show's void missing a single moment of spontaneity. From Copeland's repartee with the crowd to the band's every last choreographed shuffle step, the act smacked of a road-weary soulstress going through the motions.

Copeland started the evening by jamming her band in progress and launching into "Wild, Wild Woman" from her sophomore release "Wicked." The thick soul groove of "Should Have Come Home" followed, with Jason Tangles tweaking the bass-line heard on her new album "Talking To Strangers," lending it an improved, simpler bounce.

Sandwiched around bawdy jokes from Shemekia about single women and batteries, keyboardist Jason Tasha set shone on the organ burner "He Other Woman" and turned a neat piano solo around on "Livin' On Love."

The midsection of the set languished with the funk-gone-flat of "Talking to Strangers" and a duet between Copeland and guitarist Arthur Neilson. This pared down number, "Beat Up Old Guitar," has gotten a little old, but still features shivery dobro work from Neilson.

Copeland came to life a bit on "It's 2 a.m.," perhaps heeding her own exhortations to "Rock and roll!" Drummer Barry Harrison added a splashy finale on skin, nicely capping off the tune.

The swampy New Orleans second-line of "Sholanda's" featured moaning slide work from Neilson, but couldn't escape the malady of dreadful lyrics. Far past trite, the song was downright corny. If this is the level the next generation of blues artists, then leave me in the dust bowl.

"Ghetto Child" is Shemekia's tribute to her father, the late, great Johnny Copeland, and the way she performs the song live is a stunning machination that comes close to a religious experience. Over slow guitar arpeggios and a simmering organ, Copeland meanders throughout the club, singing the refrain in a display of intimacy that brings the entire room to a hush. Her unamplified voice is heard to spectacular effect and is truly spine tingling.

Nothing in Copeland's set escapes the perils of processed and calculated showmanship. After introducing the band, Shemekia finished strong with the rave-up R&B of "Your Mama's Talking," a rollicking cut from her debut recording "I am the Heat Up."

Copeland is clearly a dynamo of a vocal talent, but unfortunately, the young performer set so squarely in the driver's seat is coasting on cruise control when it comes time to challenge herself and her audience with an invigorating live performance.

Missy 'Works It' on latest release, 'Under Construction'

Hip-hop/R&B artist solidifies her stance as strong, influential female musician

By Nikolas Markantonatos

Since her first album, 1997's "Supa Dupa Fly," Missy Elliott has consistently produced outstanding music. Her tracks have been some of the best songs on radio in the past five years: "The Rain (Supa Dupa Fly)," "Sock It 2 Me" and "Get Ur Freak On." While Missy's dropped the weight in 2002 (losing 71 lbs.), she hasn't lost a single ounce of her bountiful talent.

Missy Elliott's music has always been layered – with heavy beats, twirling jingles and multiple personalities. But it's always been cohesive and groundbreaking. Nowhere is that better found than on "Under Construction" (titled such because Elliott's a "work in progress"), a potent display of nostalgia, humor and compassion.

Missy Elliott
'Under Construction'
Elektra

"Under Construction" is packed with one banging hit after another. Missy Elliott has always flirted on the edge of pop-culture but maintains just enough pop to keep her in the multi-platinum selling range. She continues to tread that line on "Under Construction," smashing assumptions, taking a hammer to generic hip-hop and using her equipment to build bridges.

The deaths of Aaliyah and Lisa "Left Eye" Lopes may not have affected some, but the losses, coupled with the 9-11 tragedy, shook the urban community to the core. Elliott reflects on each of these life-altering experiences throughout the album. But the fun drive is still on overdrive.

Missy Elliott's spontaneous and incomprehensive lyrics coupled with Timbaland's savvy production qualities make this duo utterly unstoppable. Just like her clothing style, her music is daring and bold.

Elliott gets the party started with "Go To the Floor" which serves as a curtain-drawing opener. She asks "What happened to those good old days/ When hip-hop was so much fun" on "Back in the Day" featuring Jay-Z. The album is her answer as hip-hop in 2003 is as old as rock and roll was in 1978 and in danger of losing its spontaneity. "Under Construction" is a throwback to old school hip-hop. But while Elliott uses the root influences of hip-hop as her foundation, the resulting sound is as fresh as ever.

A rolling beat on the laugh-out-loud funny "Gossip Folks" (featuring Ludacris) is a rant against all the "hatas." Elliott's inane lyrics ("Well I heard the bitch got hit by three zebras and a monkey") serve as her ultimate tools of defense against these so-called gossip folks. A swiveling beat accompanies uproarious lyrics: "Yo how 'bout you buff these Pumas for 20 cents or your lights won't get cut off/ You soggy breasts, cow stomachs" she fumes when confronting her enemies. The track reaches the great sky-high heights of "Work It," where thanks to a bit of studio trickery, the song's vocal hook consists of her rhyming backward. The bonus remix of "Work It" featuring 50 Cent is equally as good.

She makes little sense on "Funky Fresh Dressed," featuring a superb verse by Ms. Jade. But that doesn't detract from its infectious qualities one bit. In fact, Elliott is one of the few rappers who will defy the cardinal rule in rap: that one word has to follow the other.

You'll think you've entered an African safari once the beat on "Slide" gets rolling. If you're not sliding, dipping and shaking by the time the song's over you either possess no dancing genes or you're experiencing hearing problems.

The disc concludes as an elegy – for Left Eye, for Aaliyah (with whom Elliott once wrote a song called "Best Friends"), for Big Pun and Biggie and Tupac and by extension to hip-hop's lost innocence. While the grief is entirely understandable and the song is meant to be a heartfelt tribute, it comes off as syrups and sticky.

Elliott has a few messages she imbeds in her songs and interludes: rappers need to stop killing each other, and more MCs should dance like in the old days. It's difficult not to side with her. But the point that really excites her is the right of women to be as raunchy as men. For instance, her music is a bit raunchy on "Pussycat," but her feminist credo strengthened by her intrepid wordplay, makes it all right. With "Under Construction," Elliott has solidified her stance as one of the most influential female hip-hop/R&B artists today.

Spielberg's 'Catch Me If You Can'

on the street, he remembers a riddle his father once told him – "Why does everyone watch the Yankees? ... Because of the pinstripes." – and sees the way everyone, from the rubs-lipped young women to the hatchet-hunk owners, hang on the heels of the airline pilots. Frank weasels his way into obtaining his own pilot's outfit, and when he dons, finds that he's treated far differently from what he used to be treated as. Posing as a co-pilot, Frank is soon cashing check after check and flying to glitzy locales. Frank has learned that you aren't who you are; it's that you are whoever you want to be.

Leonardo DiCaprio, who was at the ripe old age of 27 during filming, has the right baby-cheeked innocence to pass as a 16 year old; he also has the right slick charm to convince as a posh, quick-witted hustler. DiCaprio captures Frank's youthful brio, his seamless rapture with the con, but adds a depth of poignancy to the character. As the days, months and years fly by, Frank grows more lonely and closed off.

Posing as a doctor, barking out orders to the interns he has been hired to supervise, Frank flirts with and enters the life of Brenda (Amy Adams), a sweet, naïve candy-stripper with braces. Ready to settle down and give up an empty life of dishonesty, Frank proposes and gets a job as an assistant prosecuting attorney working under Brenda's father. (The movie never makes it clear whether or not Frank was really in love or if the relationship was just another con.) But the stolid FBI agent pursuing him will not let Frank give up and settle down.

Tom Hanks plays the role of Carl Hanratty, the upright FBI bank-fraud expert, with a squarely convincing dweebish obsessiveness. Each year, Frank and Hanratty engage in a ritualistic Christmas Eve phone call because, in essence, they are all they have. The symbiotic relationship between the two achieves something more than cat and mouse.

"Catch Me If You Can" is, mostly, a zippy entertainment in the manner of "Ocean's 11." This isn't a 60s of the real world – the various struggles of the era aren't just glossed over; they're ignored – but Spielberg's swank nostalgia piece for the decade. Spielberg directs with a nimble grace, especially in scenes in which Frank uses his verbal talents to talk himself from right out under the nose of Hanratty, or when he scams $400 from a high-end prostitute. He eke out terrific performances from the cast, which also includes Christopher Walken, exuding both scampishness and a deep sadness as Frank Sr. But "Catch Me," over two hours long, begins to get bogged down. The scenes of Frank's scamming, which Spielberg presents as the actions of a lost boy rather than a criminal mastermind, get repetitive quickly. The biggest con of the movie though is that we never get to really know who Frank Abagnale Jr. really is. "Catch Me If You Can," while well acted and more playful than anything Spielberg ever directed, never gets to the heart of the story. The movie is a celebratory portrait of puckish outlaw amorality, that zings with good humor, yet never truly gets at transcendence.

'Chicago' dazzles all

Catt Above" but Gere also has perhaps one of the toughest numbers in the entire movie with what would've been the Act One closer "We Both Reached for the Gun." Making the character his, Gere puts on an authentic Chicago-slimy lilt to his and sings each song with an amusing, jazzy swagger in his voice. Come Oscar time, he should be honorably nominated.

The rest of the cast is equally outstanding with Catherine Zeta-Jones as Velma Kelly, Renee Zellweger as Roxie Hart and Queen Latifah as Matron "Mama" Morton. Director Rob Marshall has thrown together an amazing cavalcade of talent and made "Chicago" more than just a hokey musical, as it could have become in the wrong hands.

Marshall, who also directed the 1999 TV remake of "Annie," doesn't hold back on any of his musical theatre talent here. Not only was it his genius idea to transform each musical number into a fantasy sequence as opposed to the characters suddenly breaking out into song, he was also the film's dance choreographer. The song "Cell Block Tango," for example, resembles its stage counterpart at times, but takes on a life of its own too. As the imprisoned women dance with their dead lovers in the fantasy realm, back in reality, they're only telling their stories over a game of cards or talking to their lawyers.

In the song "Roxie," Zellwegger is surrounded by tuxedoed men who fawn all over her in some birds-eye camera shots, which by no coincidence is a nice homage to Marilyn Monroe's "Diamonds Are a Girl's Best Friends" and pretty much any Busby Berkeley movie musical. Marshall takes advantage of many of the techniques available in filmmaking and not in live theatre and gives this "Chicago" a dazzling, tasty flavor.

The superb cast and crew that made "Chicago" have done it justice and pulled off a remarkable feat, for it's not often a story about women who murder their lying and cheating partners can be executed with such outstanding aplomb. Raising the bar for the movie musical, "Chicago" is all that jazz and a whole lot more.

Nicholson's 'About Schmidt' psycological intrigue

Warren's talking about, but the child is at least someone who'll listen to him, as no one else seems to do, including his wife, who Warren tells Ndugu always interrupts him.

Sad, frustrated and angry at life, Warren tries to put on a happy face for his daughter's wedding. Warren thinks, and we tend to agree, that Randall's family is not up to par to be associated with his daughter. Just like Warren and Ndugu, Randall and Jeannie are almost from two different worlds. Randall's mother, Roberta (Kathy Bates), is the personification of Warren in his letters to Ndugu and also extremely smitten with Warren. (And kudos to Bates, who does the first nude scene of her career as she hits on Warren in a rickety old hot tub.)

"About Schmidt" is almost a total reversal of one of Nicholson's earliest works, "Easy Rider," because it's not a journey of self-discovery, since he was so empty to begin with. The ending of the film tends to remind us of facts we were made aware of throughout the film, but hoped we could either overlook or he would possibly beat; Warren indeed is a sad man, because he is so naive and vacant.

That's not to say he's heartless. In fact, Schmidt is one of the most sensitive and passionate roles Nicholson has played to date. After learning about Schmidt, we question whether we would've been better off knowing him like everyone else in his world does – a nice guy who leads a nice life. We've come to know so much about him in such a small amount of time that it's hard to realize he too is human, flaws and all. When Warren finally breaks down into tears, a great weight is lifted off our shoulders, but is it because we want to cry with him or for him?

"About Schmidt" marks a touching movie with performances worth remembering, and yet it's hard to imagine a film – one that appears to be one thing at first and turns out to be something wholly unexpected – could even exist. But as I'm sure Warren would agree, that's just life.

Winter movies entertain viewers sweeping through the African plains, is serviceable in a Saturday-morning television kind of way. The animation has a colorful, painterly vibrance.

"The Wild Thornberrys Movie" lacks the zingy zest that 2001's Paramount/Nickelodeon release "Jimmy Neutron: Boy Genius" had, but for its jungle of flaws, the movie has more charm in any five of its minutes than Disney's awful "Treasure Planet" had in its entirety.

'The Hot Chick.' As a popular high school cutie pie magically transforms into a guy that looks as shlumpfy as Rob Schneider, Schneider gets to dress in sparkly baby doll T-Shirts, speak in an effeminate lisp and generally act as if he's the worlds' most elaborate gay male stereotype.

"The Hot Chick" definitely ranks toward the bottom of the "Saturday Night Live" movie barrel, yet there's no denying that Schneider throws himself into his role with fearless abandon. Unfortunately, the movie never follows his lead. Schneider has to learn how to urinate upright, he masquerades as the Mexican gardener Taquito (and is nearly molested by "his" mother) and Adam Sandler shows up for a trio of cameos as a dreadlocked Rasta stoner and proceeds to repeat the same gag over and over. These aren't jokes; they're concepts for ideas that could have been jokes.

Stereotypes that are too lazy to be offensive are paraded out, along with the now standard-issue penis jokes and slapdash message-mongering about the importance of respecting people. "The Hot Chick," for all its farcical gender-bent roundelays, could have made a lively and shameless comedy of sexual confusion, yet it all too often plays it safe. There are a few funny moments, but the result could be called "Some Like It Hot For Dummies."

Pearl Jam fans in for a treat

Latest album shows band's evolving sound and sophistication

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

If you came looking for 1992, you've found the wrong album.

"They're going to crucify you for staying the same. If you change, they're going to crucify you for changing. But staying the same is boring. And change is interesting. So of the two options, I'd rather be crucified for changing."

Joni Mitchell said it in 1979, though it seems now she was speaking not of herself but prophesizing the future of another band, the only one, in fact, to make it out of the so-called grunge movement alive. With little input from its five members, Pearl Jam found itself in the pole position of the early 90s, alarmed that one album and a video had led to its actively being painted with one broad stroke after another. In alarming response, they ran far and fast. And sure, they stumbled along the way, but each hiccup in the road snapped the tradition set before it and opened new doors. They weren't milking grunge; they weren't waxing alternative. Instead, they were experimenting in a medium most of us seem to have forgotten: music. Doesn't anybody remember music?

"Riot Act," the band's seventh studio album, is not a revolution as the title suggests. More succinctly, it's an evolution – at times. More realized than 2000's "Binaural," the album is encoded with self-reference and an interest in exploration that casts an energetic eye on the future.

The first hint of that is in the album's first track, "Can't Keep." Its rhythm built from the ukelele (yes, ukelele) on up, the song receives a lush, full band treatment here, the propulsive backbeat of drummer Matt Cameron breaking like a wave at every bridge. Its free-ranging arc is artfully hemmed in by one of the most enthusiastic melodies singer Ed Vedder has penned in years.

"Save You" follows with a pounding air of indignation – the crunching rocker is controlled from below by bassist Jeff Ament, clearing the way for devastatingly pointed lyrics that load the song's emotional muscle. Vedder nearly dislodges his vocal chords by the time the second chorus has come around ("And fuck me if I say something you don't wanna hear/ And fuck me if you can only hear the treble in your head/ Please help me to help yourself"), leaving the listener to imagine the severity of the sins causing him to howl for reconciliation with such desperation.

Desperation of some nature plays a significant role throughout "Riot Act," drawing its inspiration from sources both broad (national politics, relationship strife) and personal, particularly "Love Boat Captain," a keys-laden rocker that responds directly to the 2000 Roskilde tragedy. Though the band released a statement of sympathy as artists, this response is the human grief they've been waiting to exhale. "It's an art to live with pain, mix the light into grey/ Lost nine friends we'll never know, two years ago today/ And if our lives became too long, would it add to our regret?" In the same vein, "Thumbing My Way" – an acoustic, backroads lament – finds Vedder contemplating the opportunities he's missed in life. He offers a partial explanation eight songs later in "All or None." Over a similarly distressed melody, Vedder whispers his most plaintive statement to date: "And I'm starting to believe/ that this hopeless situation is what I'm trying to achieve." From the man who once unwittingly roared for a generation, each of these shy, more private moments acknowledging mortality are truly affecting.

Pearl Jam
'Riot Act'
Sony/Epic Records

Age has also brought satisfying moments of optimism into the fold for Pearl Jam, allowing the band to retain a fierce social conscience. "I Am Mine" uses its anthemic choruses to champion individuality, while "Cropduster" and "Green Disease" immediately rise to the top and remain after subsequent spins, particularly the latter, whose cruising, new-wave backbone supports an instantly memorable hook. As for guitarist Mike McCready, whose mature songwriting efforts have always inpressively defied his shoot from the hip stage performances, "1/2 Full" is a return to form that finds his fingers opening up and infusing the song with a bit of live energy.

Divergence can be one of the strongest qualities an album can boast, and "Riot Act" marches in as many directions as it can muster in the time allotted. Sometimes, however, the free-spirited moments feel too stray when stacked next to the more textbook rock definitions a song like "Get Right" offers. "You Are" and "Help, Help" lose themselves: distinctive because their personalities have always come through in the instrumentation, here the guys seems lost in the adventure itself. Likewise, "Bushleaguer" is split with internal strife: Vedder's most pointed political commentary fights for life by throwing some humorous hooks into his deadpan intonations, but it's ultimately guitarist Stone Gossard's straight, no chaser underbelly that makes the song compelling as a musical statement rather than a social one. Not meshed as tightly at times as 1998's excellent "Yield," the album at times takes a step too many and compensates too timidly by reverting to basics. The effect can be jarring, but hell – that's rock and roll, isn't it?

The reality of "Riot Act" is that it's not an easy read, nor a proclamation tailored for a public mass; Pearl Jam hasn't taken the easy street, and they don't want you to either. Like any art worth its weight, there are wrinkles. Dig beneath the folds, and you'll find there's plenty worth sticking around for.

landmark in rock music and an essential centerpiece, its sanctity preserved in this, the latest chapter of the Stones, by Richards cascading guitar and the vocals of Lisa Fischer, whose incendiary leads rewrote the song's soul for a new century. That's right, I said it. Incendiary.

Ever the cagey vets, Mick and the boys also took large, if calculated steps to counter that emotional heaviness with old-fashioned rock and roll fun. Ronnie Wood, the "new" Stone, operates like a kid with the new corner-store guitar, playing along through the buzz of the a.m. dial to his favorite band. His partners are better off because of it. His sinewy lines continue to pull the best out of Richard's slithering riffs, highlighted best, perhaps, by his contemplative turn on the lap-slide during "No Expectations."

They kept at it similarly most of the night. "Tumbling Dice," "Street Fighting Man" and "Bitch" rang with a refreshing cockiness, the latter infused with a horn triumvirate led by longtime Stones collaborator Bobby Keyes. "Midnight Rambler" dissolved into a particularly urgent breakdown over which Jagger's bluesy harp work did all the talking, as did Keyes unchained solo on "Brown Sugar."

And though a predictable "Jumpin' Jack Flash" tied the evening off, the band used a mid-arena stage to great effect during the show's twilight, punctuated by Dylan's "Like a Rolling Stone," ably counted off by Leavell.

Too bad for them that more time wasn't spent mining a near half-century of work, though it's difficult to imagine the band's still-blistering "Satisfaction" giving way to more moments like "Expectations" or the Richards helmed "Thru and Thru," a lazy tour through the guitarists vocals but an interesting stop nonetheless. Arenas these days simply don't allow.

Even then, considerable damage had already been done: much more rock than rust, the Stones proved they still know how to roll.

Ryan Adams was a surprisingly adept opener, though his persona would play far better at One Hamilton, on the Orpheum's stage. Turning his back on the initial claim that he had been "sent to destroy Boston," Adams instead carefully carved a melodic route, revealing the fork in his country/punk roots before brashly jumping from one side to the other and back again. His definition of rock seemed to convert the majority, all of who had arrived, of course, to see The Book itself.

Late R&B artist, Aaliyah, and her legacy live on with new greatest hits album

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

In Aaliyah's short, seven year career, the young singer had amassed an impressive track record. Well deserving of a greatest-hits set after her tragic death in a plane crash in 2001, "I Care 4 U" is a tribute that features tracks from her three previous albums: "Age Ain't Nothing But a Number," "One in a Million" and "Aaliyah."

Aaliyah
'I Care 4 U'
Blackground

The greatest-hits disc shows Aaliyah's growth as an artist – an artist that morphed from a girl to a woman and one known for her individual mystique, appealing blend of sensuality, elegance and cool... with a hint of trademark mystery. The stellar lineup of songs illustrates why she's one of the best artists to emerge from the 90s.

Opening with the lilting "Back and Forth," the collection contains songs other acts have tried to emulate and shows how Aaliyah's sound helped her become a trendsetter. In fact, even pop icon Madonna, always on the lookout for what's hot and next, sampled some of Aaliyah's "Back and Forth" for her single "Inside of Me" off of her 1994 album "Bedtime Stories."

Aaliyah advanced her career in 1996 after teaming with a then-unknown Timbaland who crafted elusive and unpredictable beats. Sure they were synthetic, but they also had a kind of artificial intelligence and his rhythms a kind of organized randomness. "Are You That Somebody" and "Try Again" are some of the finest songs of the 90s. The former possesses a masterful vocal performance over one of Timbaland's most adventurous beats. The latter shuffles and lurches like no other pop song of its time.

Aaliyah, only 22 when she died and with an acting career that had taken off, had street credibility and mainstream appeal. The sultry "At Your Best" and "One in a Million" were "street but sweet" – a moniker that not only describes her music but also the singer herself. Even her later, more mature fare found a way to balance the best of both worlds. "More Than a Woman" is a sexy, voluptuous track that serves as a type of declaration of independence.

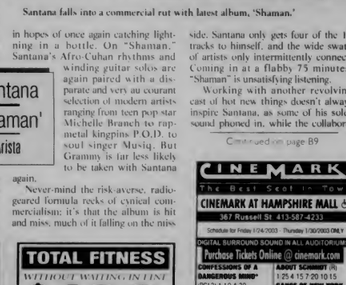
Sadly, and suprisingly, missing from the disc are "4 Page Letter" and "Rock the Boat." As compensation, we get five unreleased tracks illustrating Aaliyah's unrealized potential. "Don't Know What To Tell Ya," with a circus-like beat and Aaliyah's soft vocals intermingled, come together like peanut butter and jelly. The lush current "Miss You" and the fiery "Erica Kane," about a girl who flirts with danger, show her death is our greatest loss.

"I Care 4 U," which includes a DVD of her music videos, is a poignant eulogy and a must-have in your music collection.

Copy classic: Santana's latest release falls in the shadow of 'Supernatural'

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

By the time the 90s rolled around, 60s guitar wizard Carlos Santana had become nothing more than a nostalgic footnote for music historians: the revered, Woodstock-playing guitarist who created hits like "Black Magic Woman" and was doomed to spend the rest of his career living in obscurity, releasing albums for a dwindling cult following. Then he pulled off the comeback of the decade.



Working with a laundry list of name-brand musical acts such as matchbox twenty's Rob Thomas, Lauryn Hill and Dave Matthews, Santana and his band recorded 1999's Grammy-hogging "Supernatural." Powered by the chart-topping "Smooth," the summer anthem featuring Thomas, Santana collected a small army of awards and 14 million in sales in America alone.

Santana
'Shaman'
Arista

So what does one do for a follow-up?

Why, the exact same thing.

The spiritually-minded Santana is not just a guitar god, but a business savvy artist, and his producer, the legendary Clive Davis, is even more business minded. Rather than take any kind of artistically satisfying risks, the duo repeat the formula in hopes of once again catching lightning in a bottle. On "Shaman," Santana's Afro-Cuban rhythms and winding guitar solos are again paired with a disparate and very au courant selection of modern artists ranging from teen pop star Michelle Branch to rap-metal kingpins P.O.D. to soul singer Musiq. But Grammy is far less likely to be taken with Santana again.

COURTESY BARRY WEISS

Santana falls into a commercial rut with latest album, 'Shaman.'

Never-mind the risk-averse, radio-geared formula reeks of cynical commercialism; it's that the album is hit and miss; much of it falling on the miss side. Santana only gets four of the 16 tracks to himself, and the wide swath of artists only intermittently connect. Coming in at a flabby 75 minutes, "Shaman" is unsatisfying listening.

Working with another revolving cast of hot new things doesn't always inspire Santana, as some of his solos sound phoned in, while the collabora-

6 'Justified' Justin Timberlake (Jive)
He's made the transition from boy band pin-up to successful solo star, and it's all justified: from the hauntingly beautiful "Cry Me a River" to the rhythmic melodies of "Take It From Here." But the album's biggest achievement is in proving critics wrong, that not all teen pop stars are fading sensations.

7 'Dance for Me' Mary J. Blige (MCA Records)
The Queen of Hip-Hop Soul's wish is our command. Flying tempos, intense basslines, electronic grooves, surging samba house and even church-bells are utilized to their full potential on Blige's second remix album.

8 'Up!' Shania Twain (Mercury Nashville)
Country turned pop-crossover queen Shania Twain returns with a hook-infested album that's sure to lodge in your brain as long as it's destined to reign the charts.

9 '18' Moby (V2)
This techno maestro served up another solid mix-tape album following the hugely successful "Play," once again applying female R&B voices with his haunting instrumentation. With 9-11 impacting many of the songs on the album, "18" comes off as a more melancholy and touching album than its predecessor.

10 'Fever' Kylie Minogue (Capitol)
Sure it's one big chunk of cheese, but how delicious it is? From the lead single, "Can't Get You Out of My Head," to the dance floor stomper, "Burning Up," no other pop star served up a better guilty pleasure than this Aussie vixen..

'Bowling for Columbine' a hard-hitting film any answers, (who's he to tell us how to think?), but he does lead viewers to draw his conclusions. One might argue the film is biased and Moore purposely trying to show the evils of handguns, especially when he delves into the Columbine story or Wal-Mart's over-the-counter bullet sales. However, he does make clear he's an NRA member and agrees with the Constitutional right of bearing arms, detailing to Q-and-A Heston to ensure all his facts are straight. It's clear Moore views the controversy in a hazy gray area. But the viewer, however, who does draw his or her own conclusions based on the information marks Moore's film as effective.

"Bowling for Columbine" plays in smaller theatres and will only be available in some areas, but that makes it no less worthy of praise. It is both a funny and tragic story – a poignant yet frustrating account of life and one of the most intelligent and well-done pictures of the new millennia.

'Shaman' a poor copy of Santana's better works

tors – even if they give their all – don't quite gel. There are at least three collaborations that should have been ditched, and one weak Santana instrumental ("Victory at Won") that could have been buried with them.

There are plenty of sloppy moments on "Shaman," such as the bludgeoning, blundering "America" with P.O.D. and the misbegotten mess "Novus," in which Santan and Placido Domingo try to sandblast everything around them to pieces. Macy Gray gets lost in the thickets of "Amore (Sexo)." Latin crooner Alejandro Lerner contributes the vastly non-descript ballad "Hoy Es Adios." The individual elements sparkle, but folk-tronica artist Dido's ethereal, feathery voice and Santana's chugging guitar lines don't quite mix on "Feels Like Fire" – though I confess the song did grow on me.

There are still a few moments that shine on "Shaman." "The Game of Love," the single featuring Branch, is a lovely, effervescent bit of pop with Branch's pretty vocals looping around Santana's whirling guitar. "Sideways" with Citizen Cope is a nice blues crawl, while Ozomatli add the street-ska of "One of These Days." Nickleback's Chad Kroeger definitely seems inspired working with a legend; he gives his best work on "Why Don't You & I," in which he and Santana prove a perfect match a la Santana and Thomas on "Smooth." Considering Kroeger's band is one of the leading purveyors of neo-grunge, it's surprising how sunny the song is – not angst-rock, but downright exuberant power-pop. Naturally, Santana shines on the solo tracks, such as the Latin block-party rave-ups "Foo Foo" and "Aduuma."

Despite the highlights, "Shaman" reeks of corporate huckster-ism. Instead of trying anything new, the suits have fallen into repetition, right down to releasing a Latin-pop cocktail as the first single. "Ain't nothing changed," rap hip-hop newcomers Melkie Jean and Governor Washington on their song. "Since Supernatural," and they're right. "Shaman" is essentially just "Supernatural, part two."

Golden Globe Awards gain today's hottest entertainment due recognition and ready viewers for Oscar season

Orlean was a drug-crazed, would-be killer.

"Susan Orlean, I apologize for the second half," said Streep, who played her in the film.

Cooper, who played a stringy-haired and toothless orchid poacher chronicled in Orlean's book, offered his thanks, saying: "You've given millions and millions of stringy-haired and toothless people a lot of hope."

He also thanked co-star Nicolas Cage as well as "Nic Cage," a reference to Cage's portrayal of screenwriter Charlie Kaufman and his fictitious twin brother, Donald.

Kaufman lost the best screenplay prize, however, to Alexander Payne and Jim Taylor for "About Schmidt," adapted from the novel by Louis Begley.

U2 won the best movie song award for "The Hands That Built America" from "Gangs of New York," and composer Elliot Goldenthal received the best original score award for "Frida."

Pedro Almodovar's "Talk to Her," a Spanish drama about two men in love with comatose women in the same hospital, was chosen as best foreign film.

The Golden Globes ceremony, hosted by the Hollywood Foreign Press Association, is considered by some to be a barometer for the upcoming Academy Award nominations in February.

Many of the nominated films, including "The Hours" and "Adaptation," have been unavailable in most parts of the country as studios waited to do wide-releases closer to the awards ceremony and next month's Oscar nominations. Nominated crowd-pleasing hits such as "The Lord of the Rings: The Two Towers" and "My Big Fat Greek Wedding" were shut out at the Globes.

The Golden Globes, broadcast live on NBC, is renowned as one of Hollywood's biggest parties, where participants are encouraged to be spontaneous and irreverent.

"You have no idea how many men I've had to sleep with to get this award," said Kim Cattrall, who won in the TV supporting actress category for her role as the most promiscuous of the four women on HBO's "Sex and the City."

"The Shield" won for best TV drama, upsetting such major shows as "The Sopranos" and "The West Wing," and its star, Michael Chiklis, was named best actor in a drama series. His Golden Globe follows his surprise Emmy victory last year for playing a rogue cop on the violent, profanity-laced series on the FX cable channel.

HBO's acerbic sitcom "Curb Your Enthusiasm" won best TV comedy series. "This is a sad day for the Golden Globes. It is, however, quite a good day for Larry David," joked David, the show's star and executive producer. "I suspect the wife will be a little forthcoming tonight."

The dramatic TV actress award went to Edie Falco for her performance as the unhappy wife of gangster Tony Soprano in HBO's "The Sopranos." Gasping that she was suffering from laryngitis, she accepted her award by flapping her hands and whispering, "I can't talk."

Jennifer Aniston won best TV comedy actress for NBC's "Friends," while Films starring strong female leads conquered at the 2003 Golden Globes.

Tony Shalhoub received the TV comedy actor's trophy for the USA Network detective show "Monk."

Gene Hackman accepted the Cecil B. DeMille Award for a career spanning more than 80 films. His roles in "The French Connection" and "Unforgiven" won him both Golden Globes and Academy Awards, and he received an additional Golden Globe honor last year for the comedy "The Royal Tenenbaums."

Golden Globe honors are chosen by the Hollywood Foreign Press Association's approximate 90 members, who cover Hollywood for overseas publications.

Comedy and tragedy meet real life, making movie magic

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

Who would've thought the best film of the year would be a documentary? Not I, that's for sure.

This isn't Michael Moore's first time out to capture real-life on film. He first made it big with "Roger & Me," a 1989 film about the true story behind the General Motors plant closing down in his hometown of Flint, Mich.

But with "Bowling for Columbine," Moore's got bigger fish to fry, the gun industry. While the title lends itself to the 1999 massacre at the Colorado high school, Moore doesn't focus the entire film on it. Instead, he centers on U.S. individuals' mixed feelings over the Constitutional right to bear arms, inquiring as far up the ladder as Charlton Heston, President of the National Rifle Association (NRA).

'Bowling for Columbine'
Directed by and starring Michael Moore
United Artists
Rated R
120 mins.

Along the way, Moore makes some interesting pit stops, including a visit to Paul Nichols, brother to Terry Nichols, who was convicted in the Oklahoma City bombing with Timothy McVeigh. Paul admits to being a radical, claiming to support the right to own guns. But as Moore points out that the Constitution only speaks of the right to bear arms – not guns explicitly – he asks Nichols if he agrees it's okay for someone to have the right to bear a nuclear bomb (since that too counts as an arm). Nichols answers in disagreement to such a right, and thus Moore successfully catches Nichols at his own game, revealing the great irony of the situation.

"Bowling for Columbine" has truly funny moments as well, believe it or not. Moore shows a clip from stand-up comic Chris Rock, who poses the idea that there'd be far less shooting deaths if bullets cost $1,000 each. At no point does Moore mean to solve the controversy – only to get the audience thinking about it. Yet despite the comic relief, there are several moments throughout the film proving emotionally taxing, including a montage of clips Moore assembled with intent of displaying how the U.S. government has "aided" foreign countries by supplying them with firearms and military strategies, resulting in a violent backlash.

In one such moment, Moore documents Osama Bin Laden's CIA Special Forces training in order to fight against the United State's opponent(s) of the moment. Strategically, a video image of a plane crashing into the World Trade Center with Louie Armstrong's "What A Wonderful World" playing underneath follows.

The point is clear: the United States certainly has blood on its hands and is as much to blame for the terrorist attack as anyone else.

Moore also explores the notion that the United States has more handgun-related murders each year than any other country in the world. Is this due to our history of violence, he asks? Obviously not. Moore answers, using Germany, where 12 million people were killed in World War II, and other venues with checkered histories on par with America, where there are far less handgun crimes, as examples. Visiting Canada in search of some answers, Moore concludes the relationship must be media-related – music, movies, videogames, etc. But here, too, he cites Japan, where many videogames are created, and again Germany, where gothic music was first born, as examples with far less violence than the United States.

The best part of the film (although there're many to choose from) comes when Moore interviews shock-rocker Marilyn Manson, who was held responsible for the two boys who were to blame for the Columbine shootings. In a very candid one-on-one, the well-spoken star said the news we see every night is as much to blame, since it shapes our public conscience.

To that, Moore investigates other country's news programs and finds that their programs consist of "good news," – new speed bumps in a popular area, a spelling bee championship, etc. Is this the reason why so many U.S. individuals are prone to violence, he then questions?

Moore purposefully doesn't offer

The 10 best pop albums of 2002

1 'Under Construction' (Missy Elliott) (Elektra)
Missy Elliott's at her all-time craziest on her fourth and best album to date. With Timbaland manning the boards once again, this unstoppable duo serves up experimental beats, wacko lyrics ("p—sy don't fail me now") and uproarious and hilarious ("Gossip Folks") music. She continues to outdo herself with each lead single and "Work It," complete with fake Chinese, backward lyrics and a stomping beat continues to set a blazing path.

2 'I Care 4 U' Aaliyah (Blackground)
One of the best artists to emerge from the 90s gets a posthumous greatest-hits compilation fitting of her illustrious successes. The excellent hits "Try Again" and "Are You That Somebody," which sampled a baby crying, are included, as are five new cuts that showed the song stress was just getting started. Her untimely death is our greatest loss.

3 '3D' T.L. (Arista)
With the crazy one absent from the mix, we got a deluge of sexy and a flood of cool on this, the group's fourth album. While the album does feature Lisa "Left Eye" Lopes intermittently, Dallas Austin, Missy Elliott, the Neptunes and others create a strong album that serves as a fitting tribute to the late singer.

4 'Nellyville' Nelly (Universal)
A blazingly hot summer anthem ("Hot in Herre"), served its purpose; to attract attention to the St. Lunatic where he uses his smooth midwestern drawl and harmonious musical flow balanced by comedy and wit to produce enough charm to outshine even the brightest rock.

5 'Ashanti' Ashanti (Murder Inc.)
Ashanti's self-titled debut album relies heavily on sampling, but with hits like "Foolish," "Happy" and "Baby," this became one of the most enjoyable albums of the year. A bouncy bass, harmonies galore and hooks aplenty, "Ashanti" keeps the Irv Gotti (head of Murder Inc.) formula unbreakable (and bankable).

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. – Two films filled with strong female roles triumphed at the Golden Globe Awards on Sunday, Feb. 19, as the jazz-belting lady prisoners of "Chicago" won best musical comedy, and "The Hours" claimed best drama for its tale of women seeking solace in the work of suicidal author Virginia Woolf.

"I say to the writers, please keep writing for us; we're very interesting," Nicole Kidman said after winning best dramatic actress for her role as Woolf. "And to the directors, please keep taking chances and giving us complicated, rich characters to play."

Kidman's award marked her second consecutive Golden Globe after her win last year for "Moulin Rouge" in the musical-comedy class. She also won in 1996 for "To Die For."

"Chicago" co-stars Renee Zellweger and Richard Gere won for best musical-comedy acting, and Meryl Streep and Chris Cooper received supporting performer honors for the loopy screenwriting comedy "Adaptation."

Dramatic performance honors also went to Jack Nicholson for playing a depressed retiree in "About Schmidt."

"I don't know whether to be happy or ashamed, because I thought we made a comedy," said Nicholson, who took home his seventh Golden Globe. He stars in the tragicomic "About Schmidt" as a widower searching for meaning at the end of his life.

Martin Scorsese received the best director award for "Gangs of New York," a Civil War-era immigrant saga he'd wanted to make for decades that, once completed, was delayed for more than a year by Miramax Films.

"Maybe 'dream come true' is a cliché, because clichés are true. But it really is," Scorsese said. "I was seven years old when I first heard the stories about this time, and it's taken about – I don't know – some 40-something years to get it done."

Zellweger, who played a star-struck prisoner trying to beat a murder charge in "Chicago," thanked co-star Catherine Zeta-Jones, who was nominated in the same category.

"You're a goddess, and I'm so glad the world now knows what you can do," Zellweger told her while onstage.

"I'm literally totally shocked," said Gere, who played a slick lawyer in the musical. "I don't win anything. And I didn't even want to do this movie; that's what I know."

Streep, a frequent awards recipient who also was nominated in the dramatic actress category for "The Hours," said she wasn't prepared to win for "Adaptation."

"Oh my God, I've just been nominated 789 times, and I was getting so settled over there for a long winter's nap," she said. "I didn't have anything prepared because it's been like (since) the Pleistocene era that I won anything."

The actress last won a Golden Globe in 1983, for "Sophie's Choice." She's won two others, for "The French Lieutenant's Woman" in 1982 and "Kramer vs. Kramer" in 1980.

Blending reality and fiction, "Adaptation" follows the agonized efforts of screenwriter Charlie Kaufman as he adapts author Susan Orlean's book "The Orchid Thief" for the screen. Kaufman jokingly fantasizes in the film's climax that

Red hot Pöcker

JASMINE HAFFER/COLLEGIAN

Thomas Pöck is the leading scorer among defensemen in Hockey East. Pöck has scored 24 points (12g, 12a) in 24 games.

Move to defense sparks program

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

Tommy Pöck is obsessed with scoring. He absolutely loves it. "It's the best feeling," he says.

Pöck is a forward, a professional goal scorer. Has been his entire life. He's spent 17 years picking corners, nutmegging defensemen and leaving goalies with their jock hanging out.

Then, before a UMass practice in early November, the poor kid gets handed a black jersey – the color that defensemen wear. That's one step up from handing him figure skates.

Pöck had tried the whole defense thing before. When he was nine he had aspirations of being a goalie.

"I quit after two weeks," he says. "I couldn't take not being able to score."

Don't think that this is some whimsical change. For Pöck, the son of an Austrian scoring legend, moving back to the blueline is like changing his religion.

UMass coach Don Cahoon was asking him to make the ultimate sacrifice for his team, and for some reason he agreed.

"We are really young on defense," he says. "We had trouble bringing the puck out, that was one of our biggest problems. And I like having the puck on my stick so I figured I'd give it a shot."

Where he grew up in Austria, they put the kids that couldn't skate back on defense while the players that showed some raw talent were allowed to roam in a fluid European offensive system.

Well, college hockey doesn't work that way. At this level teams need a defenseman who not only can stand up to the opposition's attack, but can launch a counter of his own.

And like Cahoon says, "Pöck is an instant breakout."

Before Pöck's switch to the blueline, the Minutemen started 1-3 and scored only seven goals.

Since Cahoon put him on defense full time in game five against Northeastern, UMass has gone 12-7-1 and has already surpassed last year's scoring total.

Apparently the move is too good to credit with just one person, because Cahoon won't fess up.

After a recent 5-4 win over Providence, a local reporter inquired about the source of the idea. Cahoon would not budge.

"The three of us go into that room," Cahoon said referring to assistant coaches Mark Dennehy and Bill Gilligan. "And whatever comes out we all have an equal say in."

Well whoever's idea it was, the move has jumpstarted Pöck's numbers.

Individually, he is tops in Hockey East in scoring among defensemen with 12 goals and 24 points, an amazing statistic, considering he had 24 career points in his first two years as a forward.

His transition to defense has also allowed a move to the point on the power play.

"I used to play the half wall," Pöck says. "I'd rather play the point. I just try to get open and get it to the net."

He does a little more than just get it to the net. His modesty prevents him from telling you about his pro-level shot and lethal one timer. But don't let that fool you.

If proof is needed, look no further than the win over Providence. With under a minute to go in the game, a rebound was screaming for the blueline.

Pöck corralled the puck and, with his back to the play and momentum taking him out of the zone, swiveled for a slapshot and the game-winning goal past stalwart Nolan Schaefer.

But it isn't his offense that has marveled Cahoon. He and his staff knew that with Pöck's talent, all it took was the right situation to jumpstart his numbers. But it's his quick study on defense that has impressed.

"Tommy's made great strides in his transition," Cahoon says. "We don't worry about the defense. His offense is his defense. He has reduced the time we spend in our own zone."

In only his third game on the blueline, against No. 2 Maine, Pöck nullified a possible breakaway.

He anticipated Todd Jackson's home-run pass and intercepted it before Greg Moore was able to collect the puck for a breakaway chance in a 0-0 game.

A scout from the Tampa Bay Lightning, on hand to evaluate freshman goalies Jim Howard and Gabe Winer, couldn't help but comment.

"That's a pretty instinctive play for a guy who has never played defense before," he said. "He might have a future there."

Don't tell that to Pöck. He insists that sooner or later he'll be back up front. Especially if he reaches his goal of playing in the National Hockey League.

"I know I can play with them," Pöck says. "It's a little more skilled there but the skating is basically the same."

But for now he'll accept his role.

Not because he's lost his voracious desire to score. In fact, he doesn't understand why people are making so much of a fuss about his 12 goals.

"It really isn't a lot of goals," he says.

No, it's because as much as he enjoys scoring, "I like winning more."

National Team a feeder for college hockey

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

This is part one of a four-part series exploring the different paths taken to college hockey.

Chris Capraro is fighting off a defender deep in the offensive zone. He kicks the puck loose to Matt Anderson, just on the ice. Anderson looks for someone to pass to and drops the puck back to Marvin Degon at the point. Degon zips a rink-wide pass to an uncovered Stephen Werner, who fires a shot on net. The synergy with which they play is amazing – four players with one common goal.

But the paths they took to arrive at the University of Massachusetts were vastly different.

Unlike most other sports, there are many ways for a young hockey player to hone his skills as he moves on to the next level. Many players choose to stay in high school hockey. Others choose to refine their talent at a prep school or in junior hockey. Some elite players are chosen to be part of the U.S. National Team Development Program. And for some, it is a combination of these paths that led them to college hockey.

UMass is no exception to this rule. The Minutemen have representatives from each of those categories, and many donning the maroon and white come from more than one of the groups.

The National Team Development Program invites the brightest young stars in the nation to Ann Arbor, Mich. for both its under-18 and under-17 teams. In addition to living, going to school and playing with the best American players in their age group, USNTDP players gets to face off

Vaulting over adversity

A champion.

It is what every athlete ultimately aspires to be, for it signifies that you are the best of the best at what you do. It may take a lifetime, or just a few short years, but no championship of any kind is less rewarding because they all translate into the same thing.

What often makes a champion truly great are the bumps in the road that he or she must overcome to reach the top – life tests that try the mettle, grit, and determination of any individual. It is during these trials that athletes are forced to find out who they really are and what sets them apart from the rest. While having the makeup to conquer the obstacles life has thrown at you speaks of one's strength as a person, to overcome the obstacles one has created for oneself speaks of far more.

On the campus of the University of Massachusetts, you'll find a young champion whose story, lacks the glamour and the Hollywood script, yet is a testament to a character of utmost strength and is commendable nonetheless. While she may not be a hero in the eyes of anyone yet, she should be respected in the eyes of all. Her name is Brandy Green.

Brandy Green is an anonymous athlete, both by choice and by trade. She is the anti-Micah Brand, as far from Jeff Krohn as can be, for if you recognized her walking by, it would more likely be because you had a class with her than because of her two consecutive Atlantic 10 pole vaulting titles. But she knows who an athlete with her athletic resume goes unrecognized on a campus of close to 25,000 students.

"Because I run track," Green said. "It's not a glamour sport, and I wouldn't want it to be. You never expect to get the publicity, and that means that I know all the girls I run against are doing it because they love it like I do. It's something I do just because I really enjoy it, not because I want people to recognize me or read my name in the paper."

It's the kind of attitude and humility that a coach could only dream of, let alone from an athlete of Green's level of ability. Only a junior, she seems to have matured beyond her years, and has certainly come into her own talent-wise for women's track coach and former UMass track standout Julie Lafreniere.

"She's is an outstanding athlete," Lafreniere said of Green. "She is really emerging as a leader and her teammates have a tremendous amount of respect for her. It wasn't always that easy for her though."

Easy it was not for the Fitchburg, Mass. native upon choosing UMass over Temple University and Penn State three years ago. Growing up in Central Massachusetts, her passions were track and gymnastics, and she knew her college life would not be complete without the opportunity to participate in at least one of the two. When she accepted an invitation to become part of the track and field program at UMass, she knew she would fit right in at the school where her older sister would be entering her senior year.

"I knew the campus and I knew what it was like from visiting my sister," Green said. "I just wanted to have the chance to run track and stay close to home, and UMass was comfortable for me."

Coach Lafreniere thinks that maybe Green was too comfortable, as she arrived in Amherst for her freshman year with track, and track only, on her mind.

"She came here as an exercise science major," Lafreniere said. "I'm not sure she knew what she was getting into, but she was taking classes that were way over her head."

Green agreed.

"When I started here in [exercise science] I had always planned on being a coach or a trainer," she said. "But the classes just weren't for me. I don't want to make excuses either.

Wilson leaves program; Looks closer to home

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team announced that sophomore guard Kyle Wilson left the team for personal reasons on Jan. 6.

Wilson, who played in just four of the 11 UMass games to that date, will transfer to another school before the spring semester. Coach Steve Lappas speculated that Wilson wished to find a school nearer to his hometown of White Rock, British Columbia.

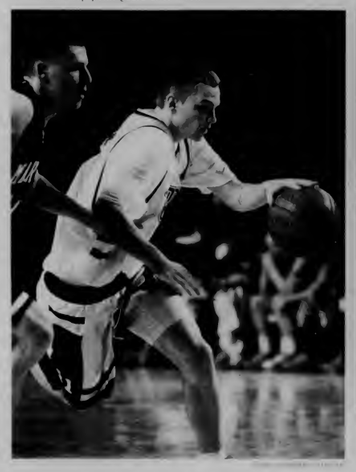
"I believe he wants to find a situation that's a little closer to home for him and his family, and we are going to help him do that," Lappas said. "We wish him well, and will do everything we can to help him find another school."

Lappas expressed regret after Wilson's decision.

"Kyle is a good person, and we're sorry that things didn't work out for him here," Lappas said.

Wilson averaged 1.5 points and four minutes per game this season. He posted three-point outings against both Boston College and Marshall.

The emergence of freshman Mike Lasme and transfer of Marcus Cox from Connecticut pushed Wilson out of Lappas' starting rotation early in the season.



Wilson enjoyed a much greater role in the squad last year as a freshman. He started seven games and played in 29 contests for the Maroon and White.

No. 11 averaged 17 minutes per game as a rookie. He scored 3.9 points and 1.3 rebounds last season. Wilson dished out 33 assists in 2001-02 good for third on the team.

He was also named the team's Rafer Giles Sixth Man of the Year last season.

Originally slated to play under Lappas at Villanova, Wilson followed the coach to UMass prior to last season. He was the first recruit to sign with the Maroon and White under Lappas.

Wilson came to UMass ranked as Canada's top point guard after his senior year at White Rock Academy. In his final season at White Rock, Wilson led his team to 33 victories and a runner-up finish at the provincial tournament. He averaged 26 points, four rebounds and 12 assists that season.

Briggs returns to team after early dismissal

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team announced on Jan. 10, 2002, that it was reinstating power forward Stephen Briggs, who was dismissed from the squad in October for violating an unspecified team rule.

"This has been a very difficult situation for everyone involved," coach Steve Lappas said. "Kids sometimes make mistakes, and Stephen has paid a pretty big price for his. In continuing to review and evaluate the situation since our initial decision, and in talking with Stephen and his family, I just believed it was best to give Stephen another opportunity."

Briggs, a freshman from Houston, Texas, will take classes and practice with the team during the spring semester and play his first year of college ball in the 2003-04 season.

"He'll practice with the team for the rest of the year, hit the books, and then have four years of eligibility beginning next year, provided he takes care of his school work," Lappas added.

Briggs was one of Lappas's highly-touted freshman heading into this year, along with Mike Lasme, Jeff Viggiano, and Alassane Kouyate. Combo-forward Rashaun Freeman, who is sitting out this season as an academic non-qualifier, was another prominent high school player who will make his UMass debut next season.

Briggs, Viggiano, Kouyate and Freeman will join sophomores Gabe Lee and Brennan Martin and junior Raheim Lamb to form a formidable, if young, frontcourt next season.

Lappas continues to look for another big man for this year's recruiting class to go along with shooting guard Artie Bowers, a top 35 recruit who signed a letter of intent in November.

After an impressive high school career, Briggs was considered a likely candidate to see significant time in the paint for the Minutemen this season before his dismissal. A top 100 prospect on most recruiting lists, the 6-foot-9, 212-pound Briggs averaged 17 points, 10 rebounds, and five blocked shots at Houston's Westside High School.

The school's captain and MVP a year ago, Briggs helped Westside to the 2002 district championship, and earned All-State, All-District and Regional All-Star recognition.

Briggs chose UMass after courtships from Georgia Tech, Wake Forest, Texas, Houston and Kansas State.

UMass coach Steve Lappas announced that Stephen Briggs, who had been dismissed from the team for violating an unspecified team rule, was reinstated on Jan. 17, 2003.

Freshman conquers competition

Freshman Jeff Viggiano has averaged 10.4 points, four rebounds and three assists since moving into the starting lineup on Dec. 23 against Rider.

Shows glimpse of team's bright future

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

Vini. Vidi. Viggi.

Massachusetts freshman Jeff Viggiano grabs the defensive rebound and streaks downs the floor. He weaves past a pair of defenders at half-court. With one man to beat, No. 22 turns his head, and the ball, to his left. The defender buys the fake and lunges to his right as Viggiano takes off with one step past the foul line, extends and slams it home with his right hand.

Coming out of the half with a 32-27 lead over No. 24 North Carolina State on Jan. 2, Viggiano and Co. have just extended it to 15 with a 10-0 run. The dunk put an exclamation on the streak, which included six points and two rebounds for the rookie.

As the crowd erupts, Ed Rubin, also known as "Sign Guy," holds up one of his latest creations, this one straight from the mind of assistant coach Andrew Theokas.

Along with a picture of Viggiano, it reads "Vini, Vidi, Viggi."

The sign is a play on the Latin, "Veni, Vedi, Vecci," which means, "I came, I saw, I conquered."

Viggiano, last year's Gatorade Player of the Year in Connecticut as a high school senior, wasn't expected to become one of coach Steve Lappas' best players as a rookie. But after a 2-6 start that saw little offense out of the small forward position, Lappas gave the 6-foot-6 Suffield, Conn. native the start against Rider on Dec. 23.

Viggiano responded with 17 points, nine rebounds and three assists. UMass beat Rider 76-54 and swept the next two games against Marshall (81-58) and N.C. State (68-56). Viggiano averaged 13.5 points in the victories, which improved the Minutemen to 5-6.

Known as a 3-point shooter, Viggiano improved the offense in many ways, but the deep ball wasn't one of them.

"I think he just does so many things. I think his passing more than anything else has made us a better team. Offensive rebounds and [the ability to] finish in transition," Lappas said when asked how Viggiano improved his team. "You find out the kid can really do a lot of things. And the thing that you brought him here for [3-point shooting], that's been the one thing that has been the weakest part of his game so far.

"He's got much better instincts driving the ball right now, which is very odd," Lappas added. "Most kids that come in as shooters find it easier to know when they are open for three than how to drive the ball and throw a ball like that. That's the thing about him that's hizarre. The things that you would think are easier to do, he's doing the more difficult things already, which is a good sign for the future."

Viggiano has also emerged as one of the team's best defenders, usually drawing one of the opponent's best players in both man-to-man defenses as well as the box-and-one and triangle-and-two.

By the end of that homestand, which ended with UMass' win over N.C. State on ESPN, Viggiano had become a fan favorite and conquered a starting spot for the rest of the season. The chant of "Vihz-ee-ah-no, clap, clap, clap-clap-clap" had become a favorite in the stands.

Following that contest, Lappas and point guard Anthony Anderson were asked about the crowd, which gave the Minutemen a decided home-court advantage. The upset victory had the UMass crowd on its feet numerous times, as noticed by the coach.

"I felt [the crowd] tonight," Lappas said of the 3,909 in attendance. But Anderson saw another reason for the crowd's enthusiasm.

"I think it's all due to Viggiano," the preseason Atlantic 10 All Conference third-team selection said.

Viggiano wasn't supposed to be this good. He wasn't a big-time recruit out of high school. Thought of as a guy who would be bombing the 3-pointer in Lappas' motion offense, little else was expected from Viggiano.

Lappas first heard about a Connecticut sharpshooter on UMass' trip to Fordham in early January, 2002. Maroon and White assistant coach Chris Walker saw Viggiano first and told Lappas that he should take the trip down to check him out.

"Chris [Walker] came back and said, 'there's a kid down at Suffield High School that you really need to go see,'" Lappas said. "And that's how it started."

Viggiano didn't have the game of his life. In fact, he struggled quite a bit from behind the arc. But Lappas saw the potential shooter in Viggiano and wanted to see more.

"He didn't shoot the ball real well [in that first game], and we were looking for a shooter," Lappas said. "But he just looked so good and had such deep range. I saw a high school kid who was very strong. He was able to shoot the ball from 28 feet with all wrist. That kind of intrigued me because you don't see high school kids able to do that.

"I think he was like 3-for-13 from three that day," Lappas added "So it's not like he was making them. It just looked good."

Lappas saw a player whose shooting touch could help his team. Wanting to see more, the schedule worked out for Lappas, who got to see more of Viggiano than most other prospects.

"We were very fortunate because the NCAA rules only allow you to see a kid five times," Lappas said. "But because it was the end of the season [when we started watching him], they count the high school tournament all as one evaluation. So we saw him plus probably eight games last year."

Viggiano, who continued to struggle shooting the deep ball, showed off his other skills and impressed the interested viewership.

"We started to see the other things," Lappas said. "The dunks. The drives. The great passes. We started to see all that."

Despite all of the skills Lappas saw in Viggiano, it isn't like major Division I programs were knocking down his door in Suffield offering scholarships. Iona was one of the other major suitors.

"I think people were concerned about his feet. Which happens a lot," Lappas said. "You are concerned about a kid's athleticism and his speed. Now, [Jeff] is pretty athletic. Obviously, he jumps really high and runs well [going forward], he's not the fastest kid [laterally], but he does so many other things. There have been a lot of good players who weren't the quickest guys in the world."

Any of Viggiano's physical limitations are more than made up for by his ability to consistently make the right decision – a trait seldom found in a rookie – and his willingness to play harder than anyone else.

"This guy knows how to play," Lappas said. "You can't teach [some of the things he does]. He's got tremendous instincts."

In the end, Viggiano chose UMass for a number of reasons.

"This is a great place to play," Viggiano said. "It's close to my house, so everyone can up to see me play. They didn't promise me anything, but they said that I would have the opportunity to play if I worked hard."

Viggiano busted his tail and when he was given an opportunity to shine, he took it. Lappas has looked to the youth movement, with rookies Mike Lasme and Gabe Lee joining Viggiano in the starting lineup.

"That's how I've always done it," said Lappas, who is in his second year at UMass. "My first freshman class, that's what this is, my first real freshman class, has always started from the beginning."

The playing experience will certainly help Viggiano, who is one of the keys to UMass' return to national prominence. But Lappas has a few other things he'd like to see his young forward work on.

"I'd like to really see him work on his shooting, like shoot 500 shots a day," Lappas said. "He needs to be more consistent as a shooter right now. That's the biggest thing he has to work on because his floor game [is solid]."

As for Vini, Vidi, Viggi?

"I really haven't done too much yet," Viggiano said. "It's a nice thought. Hopefully I'll be able to do a lot more as I get older."

Lappas feels confident that Viggiano will take part in quite a bit of conquering over the next three years.

"There's no doubt in my mind that he's going to be right in the middle of some great things here at UMass," Lappas said.

A good Will to all

Mike Marzelli

As WEEI morning drive co-hosts John Dennis and Gerry Callahan took turns giving their similar thoughts and opinions on a downtrodden and disheveled Red Sox brass following the Olde Towne Team's inability to steer Cuban ace Jose Contreras away from the dreaded pinstripes, an innocent point was raised. A caller claimed that while Larry Lucchino may be the infectious chameleon George Steinbrenner claims he is, he is now in town and maybe he deserves a break. But Will McDonough needs to lay off and give him the benefit of the doubt.

The callous and abrasive Callahan, a Boston Herald writer by trade, immediately took umbrage and outrage to his colleague's defense. He made a point to say that he knew him and enjoyed his work.

"It's Will Hiram McDonough," Callahan said. "You may not like what he said, agree with it, or think he has a right to say it, but chances are he's pretty much on the nose. So back off."

Will McDonough, a true pioneer of the sports journalism world, died unexpectedly on the night of May 5 less than a week after Callahan unceremoniously sang his praises for all to hear. He was 67 and had spent over 40 of those years to doing what he loved most, covering sports. He is one of a select few to have covered every Super Bowl, and was known for having a repertoire of sources unlike any that has ever been in the journalistic world, and it was evident in his writing.

As the Boston Globe's Bill Griffith stated in the wake of McDonough's passing, his byline was one that "made readers sit up and take notice." If you picked up one of his stories, you knew you were getting cutting edge information written in a way that set the tone and allowed as many facts to be presented as possible.

Your local Irish boy growing up in the housing projects of South Boston, McDonough got his foot in the door as an intern at the Globe while enrolled at Northeastern University and never looked back. Beginning as a boat writer for the Red Sox and Celtics in the late 1950s, McDonough found his true calling and the one that would allow him to distinguish himself in the world of sports media in 1960 – covering the fledgling Boston Patriots franchise and the fledgling American Football League's challenge to its National Football League competitor.

It was the beginning of a life's calling for McDonough and he would carry it out to the fullest, earning the respect of players, coaches, owners, and fellow media members to the point where he was quite often the first to hear about anything noteworthy that went down around the NFL.

"We used to talk once a week," Buffalo Bills President Tom Donahoe told the Globe. "And I always took advantage of his knowledge as much as he took advantage of [mine]."

Joe O'Donnell, McDonough's close friend and chairman and CEO of the Boston Concessions Group who attempted in vain to purchase the Red Sox last winter, tells the story of the two driving together in Northern Florida when word was handed down that NFL Commissioner Pete Rozelle was planning to step down at a press conference in Miami that afternoon. After making the trip south to find the conference having already ended, McDonough called Rozelle's room and asked to speak to him personally. Just a few short minutes later he was in the elevator on his way up for an exclusive one-on-one interview, the only one Rozelle ever gave on the issue.

Instances like these solidified McDonough as the greatest NFL writer of all time. He patented the "scoop," as his endless web of informants kept him in the loop and allowed him to dig up the dirt on stories before they finished happening, let alone before his fellow journalists could ever get a sniff of them. He also had a sense of pride that prevented anything from being played under his name without it having been thoroughly researched and inquired about. If it wasn't the absolute truth, he wouldn't print it. If he printed it, you could be sure it irrefutable and exact, with every available fact accounted for.

He was the first sports journalist to regularly cross over into the world of the spoken media, beginning a trend that has ballooned of late as numerous writers regularly appear on radio and television. He was the first because producers recognized that he knew what people wanted to hear. If they didn't get Will McDonough, someone else would, and in turn would be the only source to give the information, because Will was certainly the only one who knew it.

"He was the envy of everyone who covered the game because he had contacts from the owners to the equipment guys," NH Vice President Joe Browne told The Boston Globe. "There'd be little argument with anyone that he was the most influential NFL reporter in the history of modern football."

The Globe's Bob Ryan adds that while McDonough gained respect for his coverage of his own stories, he drew the ire of competitors with his propensity to break their stories. T.J. Simers of the Los Angeles Times and a former Rams beat writer back when LA still housed the team told Ryan of a conversation he had with McDonough at an NFL meeting a few years back:

"He said, 'By the way T.J., they're inside that room over there selling your team,'" Simers recalled. "It turns out they were, and nobody knew anything about it, me included. I except Will."

It was instances such as that – a California beat writer being told by his East Coast colleague that his team was being sold and moved, despite being 3,000 miles further from the source – that made Will McDonough the legendary sportswriter. But no analysis of the man would be complete without speaking of Will McDonough, the legendary man and friend.

"Will McDonough's friends were never lonely," UMass President William Bulger said in the Globe. "He was right there during the bright moments and always on hand during times of adversity. To be Will's friend was to possess a great gift."

"It Will McDonough was your friend," Dallas Cowboys Head Coach Bill Parcells added to the Globe, "You had yourself a real friend."

According to those who knew him well, he was a friend's friend in every capacity. He was fiercely loyal. He did the little things any friend is supposed to do – he remembered names, birthdays, and favorite restaurants. He picked you up when you were short a few bucks, drove you home when it was too cold to walk, and chatted it up when you and he were the only two left in the office. If not for his celebrity status and his epic reputation, he would have simply been known as a great guy. However his name allowed him to do much more with his good will, and he did.

McDonough's charitable works spoke for themselves both in volume and impact. He used his fame and influence to help thousands upon thousands through O'Donnell's Joey Fund. He gave time and money to foundations of varying origins throughout the Commonwealth and across the country. And when legendary Celtics patriarch and close McDonough companion Red Auerbach floated the idea out of forming a foundation for kids, McDonough took charge.

"He was the guy who gave me the idea for, and spearheaded, my foundation," Auerbach told the Globe. "We have track meets and swim meets and basketball tournaments for kids all over the state. That was Will's idea."

Finally, no Will McDonough tribute would be complete without the 1979 incident that first made him and his character legendary. While covering the Patriots in Foxboro, he was poked in the eye by Pats cornerback Raymond Clayborn – and responded by laying the defensive back out with a fist to the face. It was an unparalleled display of aggressiveness for any reporter, and guaranteed McDonough respect around the league far beyond his reporting capabilities.

"You know how, when you're a kid, you go around saying, 'my dad can beat up your dad?'" Son Sean McDonough told the Globe. "Well, after that, I went to school saying 'never mind beating up your dad. My dad can beat up an NFL player."

Reporter. Writer. Confidant. Pioneer. Friend. Family Man. Legend. Will McDonough wore all of those hats, and wore them all very well. He was Boston sports, and he transcended the NFL. He will be sorely missed around New England and across the nation not only by his family, friends and colleagues, but by those he covered, wrote about, discussed, and followed, and certainly by all those who have read and thoroughly enjoyed his work.

We are all better off for having read, and read about, Will McDonough. He was great for the sports world, the city of Boston and the rest of the world. There will never be another like him, yet his legend will be passed down through his many disciples and all those who took a piece of the great man with him. He is deserving of recognition the world over, yet he would never be the type to accept it. So let us remember Will McDonough for who he was, what he did, and that which he shared with so many of us: a love for sports and a passion for life.

Hats off Will, you'll be missed.

Lowe misses banquet due to surgery

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – Boston Red Sox pitcher Derek Lowe had surgery after being diagnosed with skin cancer on his nose, but he is expected to make a full recovery and be ready for spring training.

Lowe had surgery two weeks ago, Red Sox spokesman Kevin Shea said Thursday, Jan. 16. Because of the procedure, he was unable to attend the annual dinner of the Boston Baseball Writers' Association of America, where he was co-winner with Pedro Martinez of the Most Valuable Player and pitcher of the year awards.

A year after failing as a reliever, Lowe moved into the Red Sox starting rotation and had instant success. He threw a no-hitter in April and went 21-8 with a 2.58 ERA to finish third in the AL Cy Young voting.

Martinez went 20-4 with an AL-best 2.26 ERA and 239 strikeouts to finish second in the Cy Young voting.

More than 900 people packed a hotel ballroom on one of the coldest days of the winter for the 64th annual dinner, which also honored Texas shortstop Alex Rodriguez, Cincinnati pitcher Jose Rijo and longtime Detroit broadcaster Ernie Harwell.

"You don't know how lucky you are to be here tonight instead of last night so you won't have to hear my guitar," said Red Sox general manager Theo Epstein, who played guitar at a fund-raising concert on Wednesday night.

But outfielder Johnny Damon disagreed.

"Theo, man, you can rock out pretty good," he said.

Rodriguez was given the first Ted Williams Award, created in the memory of the Red Sox Hall of Famer who died this summer. The Rangers slugger will receive his award when Texas visits Boston this summer.

Harwell won the Fuchs Award, named for the former Boston Braves owner, for long and meritorious service to baseball. He told crowd-pleasing stories about Hank Bauer and Gordie Howe but veered into trouble when he also mentioned that he called the 1978 AL playoff game against the New York Yankees, even mentioning the forbidden name of Bucky Dent.

"You had a great career, and you've touched so many people's lives," Damon, who won the chapter's Good Guy Award, told Harwell. "It's great to share this stage with you tonight."

Rijo was given the Tom Conigliaro Award in recognition of his efforts to return to baseball after five years and five operations.

"To be compared to Tony is a great honor," Rijo said. "Not just as a baseball player, but because of his heart."

Other awards included:

Major league executive of the year: Minnesota Twins general manager Terry Ryan.

Major league manager of the year: Mike Scioscia, Anaheim Angels.

Jackie Jensen Award, for the Boston player demonstrating superlative effort: pitcher Tim Wakefield.

New England player of the year: Chicago White Sox first baseman Paul Konerko.

Red Sox rookie of the year: pitcher Casey Fossum.

Red Sox comeback player of the year: shortstop Nomar Garciaparra.

The thing that really kept me going," Garciaparra said, "was that when you get out there in front of 30,000 people, they're out there, win or lose, cheering you on."

National Team provides prepared hockey players in exhibition contests with college and junior teams throughout the nation.

"The major difference is confidence," said Boston University coach Jack Parker, who has six alums of the team on his current roster. "They've played at a different level, they feel like they've been challenged a little bit more. They've gotten through a tough schedule, tough competition with some of the best players around."

Werner played with the squad for two years under coach Mike Eaves, finishing sixth on the team in scoring. The adjustment to a new home, locale and school is a tough one to make, but according to Werner, it was made easier by his teammates.

"The best thing about the national team is that there are 25 guys that are your best friends – they moved away from home as well, so whether you're on the road or not you're with your friends," the Chevy Chase, Md. native said.

The National Team's experience culminates with the squad competing at the Under-18 World Championships, which Werner and his teammates won gold at last year. According to the freshman, playing eight games over the course of 12 days prepared him for participating in any college tournament. Additionally, the amount of physical preparation done with the Under-18 team makes for freshmen that are very well conditioned.

"You're lifting three times a week and working out the two other days doing boxing or some kind of conditioning," Werner said. "It's year-round, it's during the season, and it really prepares you for the college hockey season. Physically, [the transition] has been pretty smooth."

Coming from an area that is not a typical hockey hotbed, Werner looked for options outside of high school. Had Werner not been invited to take part in the National Team, he likely would have attended a prep school, such as the Lawrenceville School in New Jersey. Still, the Under-18 squad provided the best options for making the jump to college hockey.

"I knew that I could compete at the college level because I played some of the top schools last year, so that was a huge help for me," Werner said.

The major contrast between the U.S. team and college hockey is that in the college ranks, every game has added importance, whereas the National Team played many exhibition-type games throughout the year.

"The difference is the importance of the games now," Werner said. "Playing with the national team, you might lift the day before a game and sacrifice maybe being in the best shape for that game, whereas here, the games are so important that you really just throughout the week are training, but you stop a couple days before so you can be in great shape before the game."

As for the scholastic side, members of the Under-18 team attend an area high school in their time in Ann Arbor. For Werner, the transition to college work was no more difficult than any other student moving on to college.

"I've always been responsible in school," he said. "I wouldn't say the work is that much harder it's just a different format that I had to get used to going to class only two days a week where most of the work is done out of class rather than in class."

But while many of the talented young players in college hockey come from the National Development Program, just as many can be found in area high schools, in juniors or at some of the nation's best prep schools.

"Chris Dyment and Pat Aufiero both arrived at BU, one played for the U.S. Team, one stayed for his senior year at Reading and both had great freshman years here," Parker said. "It's not the be-all, end-all, but we're certainly happy with the guys we've gotten from that program."

A trip to the ice; Newfound respect for the game

Eric Soderstrom

It's early on a January Friday evening inside the Mullins Center's Practice Rink and the ice is packed with children, joined in what looks like a klutzy carousel. At the far end are two boys, no more than four feet tall, hidden under dark, oversized stocking caps. One begins to chase the other, and soon they're stopped at the opposite end of the rink, bent over, gasping for that familiar throat-scratching, tongue-stuck-to-a-lamp-post brand of oxygen.

"Are you a hockey player?" Although nearly silent, the voice is rasping, and it grabs me immediately. Turning left, I see a boy with eyes the size of Oreos, his hopes ablaze from the previous hour of Public Skate time, which the facility so generously offers. "Sorry kid," I say, in an almost guilty tone. "I'm not famous." "Oh," he returns, and walks away.

Others follow, but none have the guts to ask the same question. Instead, they're just pointing and whispering, positive they've just crossed the paths of two Men with Hockey Sticks (10-year old definition of Man with Hockey Stick In side Mullins Center: 1. Constituent of UMass hockey team. 2. NCAA Division I hockey player. 3. Insanely gifted puck performer; hockey's gift from God. 4. Coolest person I've met in the last five minutes. 5. Wayne Gretzky).

What they don't know is that I'm just here for Puck Time, the only two hours of the week students are allowed to bring sticks and pucks onto the playing surface. And that I've been forced here by a hockey-impassioned buddy of mine, who's already on the ice cutting hiss-and-swish noises into the zamboni's polish.

There he goes, gliding from side to side. Now he's backward. Now he's sprinting. There's a crossover, I think. Maybe a pivot, or two. And now, after kicking snow up into the air, he's stopped, without complication. I'm not moving either, sitting comfortably on the bench, searching my mental records for the Last Time I Skated file. Oh, there it is: October 20, nineteen-eighty-never.

"Hey, what are you waiting for?" Pointing up to the glass-enclosed balcony on the arena's top floor, I say, "Them, to leave." There they are, 50 of my closest fans standing in a row, waiting for Mr. Hockey to jump on the ice and dazzle them with an array of stickery. Too bad I can't skate. Too bad the moment my skates touch the ice, the hype that is I, will turn into the definition that is humiliation. Like most Americans, hockey is foreign to me.

I can speak many languages. I understand the dismantling choreography of the oil-slick ankle-breaking crossover and the thunderous volume of an alley-ooping, gravity reducing, rim-destroying, I-will-eat-your-children slam. That's basketball. I know what it means to bust through the O-line and annihilate the signal caller, shuffle, prance, swagger and strut to Six Town, and pull a oob-ech-yack-ugh-get-left-God not again (a.k.a. a Scott Norwood). Easy, football. And if someone's singing chin music, throwing crazy, pigeon-killing heat, tossing Wiffle-like, strike-zone foolery, or flirting with the embarrassing, toilet-paper-stuck-to-your-foot calamity that is the Mendoza line, I comprehend. It's baseball. But what's with this twisted wrister, graphite-nickel-California Gold Rush-flex composite blade, one-timing saucer stuff?

Actually, my friend says. "You're wearing Ray Bourque Sher-wood 7777 gloves, Easton Z-Air skates, and that's an Easton Cyclone graphite stick, with a Bauer blade made of a wood composite." Oh, right, Ray Bourque. I know him.

I actually know my fair share of hockey gospel, thanks to the world's many forms of communicative media. But up until this month, I never really appreciated the game. When's the last time you threw on a pair of ice skates? It's not easy. Stay low, bend your knees, and try to forget that your feet are tilted outward on uncomfortable angles. Then, move forward. Backward, if possible. And don't wobble or fall, because it'll slow you down. Screw stopping. That's what the boards are for.

Hockey isn't like any of the other four major sports. Pick-up hockey is virtually non-existent. You don't get together with your friends on a summer afternoon and play hockey during the barbeque. You don't see anyone passing the puck around during hockey tailgates. And even if you do, it's street no-ice-involved hockey. There's no swerving through two 210-pound muscle-ridden defenders on less than three centimeters of sharpened steel, or malicious crosschecking into immovable seamless glass, or onto frozen water. Ice hurts. I promise.

If you haven't skated in a while and you're a hockey fan, you're viewing experience is slanted. Of course, skating is like everything else in life. It's difficult if you don't do it every day. But I don't throw footballs, hit baseballs, or shoot basketballs every day, and those tasks still don't seem as difficult.

If those kids had been staring down on their mythical Mr. Basketball, I could have at least kept my stance. Instead, as my skates hit the ice for the first time, I shake, wobble, stumble, and fall.

One-by-one, the children remove their faces from the glass, and turn around, in disappointment. But I'm okay with the reality I'm no longer appreciated. These kids stuck around to watch me, just because they thought I could skate well. I have a greater appreciation of hockey because I can't.

Murray's family helped a Hall of Fame career

By Josh Dubow
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – Eddie Murray's family has always been an important part of his baseball career – from the games he played with his 11 siblings growing up in Los Angeles to the lessons he learned from his four brothers who also played in the pros.

That's what made last week's Hall of Fame election so difficult for Murray. It came on the day of his sister Tanja's funeral.

"I haven't had a real chance to celebrate yet," Murray said Thursday, Jan. 16. "I'm getting more and more comfortable with this now. I had a tough week. I hope things start snowballing the other way."

Murray and Gary Carter were elected into the Hall last Tuesday and will be inducted on July 27 in Cooperstown, N.Y.

The two newest members of the Hall were formally introduced at a news conference Thursday.

"I will be able to savor this for the rest of my life. It's a dream come true," said Carter, who will be the first player to go into the Hall with a Montreal Expos cap on his plaque.

There was no debate about which logo would adorn Murray's plaque. He played his first 12 seasons with the Baltimore Orioles, establishing himself as one of the most feared hitters in the game.

He finished his career with 504 home runs and 3,255 hits, joining Hank Aaron and Willie Mays as the only players with at least 500 homers and 3,000 hits.

But Murray said he wasn't even the best player in his family – that title goes to older brother Charles. Two other older brothers, Venice and Leon, also played in the minors, and younger brother Rich played 57 games with the San Francisco Giants.

"I played baseball because of my older brother," Murray said. "He's always been my hero. Anyone who ever saw all five of us play would say that Charles was the best. I saw him play, and that was what I wanted to do."

Murray learned a lot about baseball from his brothers, trailing them around as a bat boy at their games and playing big family games at their house.

Other kids in the neighborhood would flock to the Murray house, including Hall of Famer Ozzie Smith – a high school teammate of Murray's.

"You can't beat what I had as a kid growing up," Murray said. "It was really awesome to always have someone there to challenge you. Those other brothers weren't going to let you win. You had to play to their level."

Murray and Carter, teammates for one season in Los Angeles, had complete opposite personalities.

Carter, nicknamed The Kid, was one of the most engaging players with media members and fans. Murray was much more reserved, often avoiding interviews because of what he felt was mistreatment by writers early in his career.

Murray said he doesn't regret how he handled the media.

"Notoriety is not what everyone seeks," he said. "Nobody in this room would want to talk to me if I didn't play. That's the bottom line. My thing was to play ball. I wanted ownership, my teammates and the guys in the other dugout to know what I was doing. That's what was important to me."

The decision to put an Expos logo on Carter's plaque ended a debate that began with his election.

Carter had expressed an interest in having his plaque adorned with a Mets hat – the team he won the 1986 World Series with and now works for – but said he wasn't upset at the Hall's announcement.

The Hall of Fame consults players about the choice of hat but makes the final call.

Carter played most of his career in Montreal, getting 1,427 of his 2,092 career hits and 220 of his 324 career homers with the Expos.

"To me, it's not an issue," Carter said. "I'm glad I didn't have to make that decision. There's a place in my heart for every team I played on. But this is the most noble thing.

"It would be nice to have a split for the hat, if there was a position for that."

Both Carter and Murray shied away from the controversy over whether Pete Rose should be reinstated to baseball and allowed on the Hall of Fame ballot.

"No question Pete is a great ambassador to the game of baseball with what he accomplished on the field," Carter said. "His 4,256 hits will forever be in the Hall of Fame. The issue of reinstatement, I'm glad I don't have to be a part of it. To me, Pete is a Hall of Famer because of the great career he had. End of story."

Rose, the career hits leader, agreed to a permanent ban from baseball in August 1989 following an investigation of his gambling.

Big Goal Capraro

Brand wants presidents more involved in sports programs

By KEN PETERS
Associated Press

ANAHEIM, Calif. (AP) — Among the changes Myles Brand envisions for the NCAA is having college presidents play a stronger role in their schools' athletic programs.

During the organization's convention that ended Tuesday Jan. 14, the new NCAA president stressed academic reform to ensure that athletes have "the best possible chance to succeed in college and beyond."

He believes the heads of the colleges and universities have a major responsibility in reaching that and other goals.

The principle of presidential control is the essential feature of the reform movement," said Brand, the former president at Oregon and Indiana who became the NCAA president on Jan. 1.

"Though pundits, external commissions and study committees may hope to influence the future course of intercollegiate athletics, the fact of the matter is that presidents are best positioned to change their campus perspectives and behavior."

Brand, the first college president chosen to head the NCAA, proved to be an involved, decisive university administrator when he was at Indiana during the Bob Knight controversy.

Brand fired the volatile basketball college coach 2 1/2 years ago because, Brand said, Knight violated a zero-tolerance policy the university had imposed on him.

"When missteps in athletic programs occur universities are open to criticism, and the presidents are the ones on the front lines, I know because I have been there," Brand told about 1,400 NCAA delegates during his "State of the Association" speech on Sunday.

"It is presidents who have the ultimate responsibility for setting standards and ensuring that those standards are followed," he added.

The NCAA, long considered a sludgy, slow moving organization, apparently will be more dynamic under Brand, whose contract runs through 2007.

The emphasis on academics will increase, the backing of gender equality will continue and there will be a move to increase opportunities for minority coaches with a football "coaches' academy" and mentor program.

Although there was no general voting on issues by Division I delegates at the convention, some of the committees made headway.

Kansas chancellor Bob Hemenway, the chairman of the NCAA division I committee, said the organization intends to institute the academic reform package — which would include changes in admission policies for athletes and more timely tracking of their progress in college — as soon as possible without being overly hasty.

"One thing the board feels very strongly about is that any reform is not something that gets put into place in 2008, 2009, 2010," Hemenway said. "We want to, if we think we can adopt an academic reform package that will have an immediate impact.

"The directive we're on now is that by April of 2004 we're the directors will have voted on the entire package."

Among the current reforms is a change in early eligibility that will take effect in August. The new sliding scale will weigh both the student's SAT exam and grades in high school.

Previously, a score of at least 820 on the SAT or a 16 on the ACT was required, but the change determines eligibility by combining the score with a student's high school grade-point average.

Bengals finally get something right

It's about time the worst franchise in the NFL did something worthy of praise. Cincinnati, which holds the first pick in the NFL Draft after a 2-14 year, hired defensive guru Marvin Lewis, formerly of the Washington Redskins and Baltimore Ravens.

Lewis will have a tough job in Cincy, as the team has been the laughingstock of the league for the past few years. The Bengals, who went 4-12 in 2000, seemed to be on the right track after finishing 6-10 in 2001 and boasting some very talented players. But they tanked it last year and, after thinking they had found the man to turn the franchise around in Dick Lebeau, had to start from scratch once again.

Lewis is a great hire here. He was the defensive coordinator for the Ravens in their Super Bowl year, which saw the Baltimore D notch one of the most impressive seasons in NFL history. It was a bit of a shocker that Lewis didn't get a job last year, but he took on the role of defensive coordinator and assistant head coach alongside Steve Spurrier for the Redskins.

The 'Skins defense was disappointing this year, but that didn't hurt Lewis's chances.

I have picked on the Bengals quite a bit over the past year, so it's nice to see them do something positive. Maybe they will be able to avoid both the 0-16er watch and the run for the first pick next year.

The Refs come under fire

Controversy 1:

It all started in the Fiesta Bowl, when Miami was flagged for a terrible pass interference call on an Ohio State fourth-and-three from the five yard line in overtime. At first, when the ball fell to the earth incomplete, the Hurricanes stormed the field among fireworks and tears, celebrating another National Championship.

Then someone saw a flag.

Field judge Terry Porter, who better never drive through Miami, Fla., first signaled an incomplete pass when Ohio State's Chris Gamble dropped the pass in the end zone, but then threw the yellow flag down for pass interference on Miami freshman corner Glenn Sharpe. There was some contact on the play, but Gamble had a clear chance at the pass, which he got two hands on, but couldn't bring down.

Sharpe in no way impeded Gamble's shot to make the play and clearly didn't get to the receiver early. No way that should have been a flag in overtime on what would otherwise have been the final play of the championship bowl.

Clearly one of the worst calls I've ever seen.

Controversy 2:

With the first round of the playoffs came more officiating problems. The Giants, who had given up a 24-point lead to the 49ers – the second biggest comeback in NFL Playoff history – were the victims of a missed pass interference call on the final play of the game.

After having fallen asleep over the final 20 minutes of the game, the Giants were able to finally put together a solid drive at the end of the fourth quarter down to the San Francisco 23-yard line. Having missed a previous field goal due to a bad snap, Giants holder Matt Allen warned kicker Matt Bryant to watch out for a reoccurrence of the mishap. Allen was right, and when he couldn't get the snap down, he was forced to run with the ball. As time ran out, Allen flung a desperate pass to one of the eligible offensive linemen downfield. The pass fell to the ground after a Niner pulled the prospective receiver down, and when a flag was thrown everyone thought the refs had seen the blatant pass interference on S.F. — thus giving the Giants a second chance to kick the game-winner.

But they had, in fact, thrown the flag on the Giants for having an ineligible man downfield. The illegal man wasn't the one who was pulled down as the ball was in the air, so the Giants should have had another chance at the field goal.

Like they would have made it.

Hopefully the fallout from this missed call helped explain to those boneheaded Oakland Raiders fans the difference between getting shafted by the referees and getting unlucky. When the refs messed up on the Giants game, the league changed some rules around regarding the way referees would deliberate in certain situations. This rule change came in direct response to the mistake.

This was in contrast to last year's "tuck rule" call that saved the Patriots from a fumble and a likely ousting in the second round of the playoffs. The Pats, of course, won the game and eventually the Super Bowl. However, even though the league supported the call the next day and didn't change a single rule because of it, those Raiders fans are still whining.

There's the difference. If the league changes something after the fact, you get screwed. If it doesn't...shut up.

Controversy 3:

Of course, the refs managed controversial call No. 3 a week later in a game between the Titans and the Steelers. The game, one of the best in playoff history, went into overtime. The Titans won the coin toss and drove down the field. Kicker Joe Nedney lined up for the game-winner and pulled it, but one of the Steelers ran into him after the ball was away. Nedney embellished his fall and drew a flag from the officials, giving him another shot at the kick—this time from five yards closer. He made it, and the Titans headed to the AFC Championship.

Following Nedney's kick, Pittsburgh coach Bill Cowher sprinted after the officials and screamed at them as they left the field. He and his players then whined throughout the post game interviews that the zebras had taken the game away from them.

Well, next time don't run into the kicker. It was an obvious call and the referees had to throw the flag.

Try looking in the mirror and putting the blame on the people who really deserve it – the players and coaches who didn't do enough to win the game.

Idiots.

LeBron's new ride

High school basketball player LeBron James scored a brand new SUV over the winter. Apparently his mother took out a loan at the bank to buy her son the gift. Her collateral? Her son is LeBron James. What banker isn't going to take that one?

Good for him. Let's just move on.

Theo Epstein and the Sox miss out on everyone

The Red Sox hired the youngest general manager in history during the off-season and then missed the boat on every big-name player the team laid eyes on.

Epstein was unable to snag Jeff Kent, Jose Contreras, Edgardo Alfonso and Bartolo Colon, despite making major plays for all four. He was closest on Colon, but was unwilling to give up both Shea Hillenbrand and Casey Fossum for the righthanded fireballer. Understandable, since he didn't expect to be able to re-sign Colon after his current contract expired after this season.

Hopefully, Epstein can throw together a team that can make a run at the Wild Card. This is because the Yankees have had a tremendous off-season that pushed their payroll beyond reason, likely 50 percent higher than any other team in the league. Unbelievable.

At least the Sox got Jeremy Giambi and Ramiro Mendoza. They'd be great signings if they weren't the cream of Boston's free agent crop.

Palmer wins the Heisman

This one was a gimme, and USC's Carson Palmer proved it after the fact by outplaying Heisman runner-up Brad Banks of Iowa in the Orange Bowl. The Trojans dismantled the Hawkeyes, 38-17 behind a 303-yard performance from Palmer.

Palmer is probably the No. 1 pick in next year's draft. Good job by him. Anyone who can make Pete Carroll look good deserves the bonus money he is sure to get.

A match made in...

I don't know why I believed Bill Parcells last year when he said that he was done with coaching. Maybe it was because he made ESPN's NFL pre-game show the only one worth watching. Or maybe it was because I'm a moron. Either way, when it was announced that Dallas Cowboys owner Jerry Jones was courting Parcells for his head coaching spot, I was shocked. And when they actually signed the deal, I was betting 18 games as the over/under before Parcells grabs Jones by the throat and throws him to the ground.

But hey, maybe that's just wishful thinking.

It is one of the most gruesome sports injuries I've ever seen. Miami sophomore running back Willis McGahee, who was a shoo-in for a top 10 pick in this year's NFL Draft, gets hit right in the knee in the fourth quarter of the Fiesta Bowl.

We found out a day later that McGahee tore two ligaments in his knee and needed serious reconstructive surgery. My initial reaction was that McGahee was lucky to be a sophomore, where he could rehab this year and come back and prove his worth again as an upperclassman. Then he shocked me by announcing his entry to the NFL Draft just days after his surgery.

It sounds crazy, but in the end, this is probably the best idea for him. He'll be giving up some money, because he'll only be a third- or fourth-round pick, but he'll have the finest trainers and doctors working on him and, of course, he'll have made the NFL.

That one could get ugly

UMass announced that its football team will play at Division I-A power Kansas State next September, getting $350,000 for its trouble. KSU, one of the top football programs in the nation, had an off year last year.

The Big 12 powerhouse finished just No. 6 in the nation with an 11-2 record.

Kansas State beat up on Western Kentucky, which would go on to win the I-AA Championship, 48-3 in its season opener.

Oh, and State will probably be a much improved team next year.

The Minutemen took on North Carolina State last season at Carter-Finley Stadium in Raleigh, N.C. The Wolfpack, who finished No. 11 in the polls this season, beat Division I-AA UMass 56-24 last September.

The team received $180,000 for last season's N.C. State game.

Green leaps and bounds over foes

though. I wasn't trying at all."

By the time her first semester ended, Brandy Green had gone beyond digging herself a hole – she had grasped the shovel and formed herself a canyon.

"I can't even tell you how bad her first semester was," Lafreniere said. "She created such a mess for herself and just had her back right up against the wall. We supported her the whole time, but it just wasn't working for her. It was to the point where I didn't think it was possible for her to do it, to turn it around.

"She knew what her options were – either try as hard as she could, or give up."

Throughout her academic troubles, Green says she knew she was harming both her life and athletic potential with her actions, and attributes it to being both young and naive.

"I knew at the time I was only [hurting myself]," she said. "I just didn't always care, and I don't know why that was. Looking back on it I can see how stupid I was and I wish I could change that, but I knew I couldn't so I just did my best to fix everything I messed up for myself."

For Brandy, the process of correcting her mistakes began with a little help from a family member. Her older sister came to Lafreniere on campus one day to speak about her misguided sibling. She told the veteran coach that her sister had never been too keen on her academics, and that athletics – mainly track – had always been her life. She thought Green deserved to give up both Shea Hillenbrand and Casey Fossum for the righthanded fireballer. Understandable, since he didn't expect to be able to re-sign Colon after his current contract expired after this season.

"I knew [Lafreniere] put herself on the line for me," Green said. "I wanted to work things out because I wanted to keep running, but also because I wanted to thank her for her faith in me and show people that I could do it."

Green proceeded to make UMass her home away from home. In addition to the normal course load and athletic schedule required of any athlete at the university, Green remained at the school through winter, spring, and summer breaks alike, slaving over course after course she needed to retake in order to correct her freshman mistakes.

Two A-10 titles, a change in major from Exercise Science to Sociology, and close to two years later, Green enjoyed most of this year's winter break at home, her first such break without an academic workload since she began school in the fall of 2000.

"I am just so thrilled and amazed," Lafreniere said. "She knew exactly what she had to do and never complained about it once. Her teammates never saw how hard she was working, but of course I always did. While the other girls would go home to enjoy time off, Brandy was here working her butt off. I really underestimated her because I wasn't sure if she could do it, and she proved me wrong. It just proves her determination as a person. She was just amazing."

With her academic troubles a memory, Green can again turn her full attention to her track career, announcing his entry to the NFL Draft just days after his surgery.

"My goals in school are just to work harder every year," Green said. "I'm just like any other person where obviously doing what you like is more fun than doing work, but I know now that to have track I need to have school and so I have to give each the attention they need."

Through it all, Green has remained a competitor.

"I just can't personally accept anything from myself that isn't my best effort," Green said. "I just want to win. If I don't win, though, knowing I gave it my all satisfies me because I know I did all I could. I just want to be able to know I gave my best effort."

"Brandy is the ultimate competitor," Lafreniere said. "She wants to win and she wants to get better. That's all you can ask for in an athlete."

In a conference known mostly for its basketball, Brandy Green may have picked the most difficult event to compete in and win. Pole-vaulting began as a men's sport, and due to the extreme upper body strength required to succeed, it is not blessed with droves of female participants. Because of this, the number of women competing is small and select – in other words, Brandy doesn't face any cupcakes on her way to the top. The ones who do it are there because they do it well.

"Pole vaulting is a unique challenge for any girl," Lafreniere said. "It's a men's sport that was really designed for a man's body type; however the biggest disadvantage for someone like Brandy is in its conflict with other events. She also runs hurdles, and far too often she finds herself with the two events scheduled at the same time, forcing her to run back and forth.

"It really forces her to focus and refocus, which she does very well. Her success in the vault is a direct compliment of her ability to do that."

"I like to vault because I know I'm going up against girls who like to do it and do it well also," Green said. "It gives me that adrenaline rush that helps me do my best, and carries over into hurdles or whatever else I do. When I'm out there I don't want to know my scores or anything, I just want to compete against the best. I just want to show the other girls what I can do and say 'There it is, now show me you can keep up, show me you can beat me!'"

How will Brandy Green react, knowing that girls will certainly be gunning for the two-time A-10 Pole Vaulting champion?

"It puts pressure on all of us," Green said. "For me, I have to maintain the high standards I've set for myself and for them, they have to keep up with me. Of course it's a stress and tough at times, but it's all worth it when you win."

"My goals for myself haven't changed just because I know people are gunning for me now. Anything less than another A-10 title will be a disappointment, and personally I'll be [mad] if I don't make a 13-foot vault, other than that I just want to do my absolute best."

"Brandy just has worlds of potential still left in her," Lafreniere said. "She still has things she definitely needs to work on, and she does that with [women's pole vaulting coach] Ken O'Brien and [women's hurdles coach] Antoinette O'Carroll everyday. They just think the world of her as a gifted athlete.

"Yes, she should accept nothing less than another Atlantic 10 title, and even beyond that she should focus on doing well at the ECAC's as well. She's already proven her dedication to track by pulling herself out of her academic [slump], so she has nowhere to go but up."

Success or no, at the end of each day Brandy Green retains the same modesty that allowed her to become a champion and will foster those to come.

"She has a school record [in the pole vault] that I'm not even sure she knows she has," Lafreniere said. "She really just runs and vaults because she likes to run and compete and nothing else."

"At the end of my college and competing days," Green said. "I'll still be running, because I'll never lose that desire to stay active and stay competitive. It's just my nature."

Brandy Green shows off the vaulting ability that has led to two straight Atlantic 10 Championships. Green will go for her third straight title on Feb. 22 in Kingston, R.I.

Despite her story, and this article, Brandy Green isn't expecting to gain the notoriety or familiarity she has never received, and don't expect her to start it either.

"I'm not even going to read this article," Green claimed. "I only read the horoscopes."

A few short years ago, the horoscope would have turned up negative for Green, but that was before her self-determination and ultra-competitive spirit turned her fortunes around. But if Green is approached on campus and told of her fame and what she's done, don't expect her to find happiness in that, because she has all the satisfaction she needs in recognizing what she's accomplished within herself. So don't tell her how good she is, or how happy you are for her, because she doesn't want to hear it – unless you think you can beat her.

New York City greets Godzilla

By RONALD BLUM
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – Hideki Matsui's formal introduction to New York was a reception befitting a head of state: Hundreds of reporters and dozens of camera crews filled a hotel meeting room. Yankees manager Joe Torre interrupted his Hawaiian vacation and Roger Clemens came up from Texas.

As Godzilla put on the famous pinstripes for the first time, he turned around to proudly display his usual No. 55. Flashes popped and shutters clicked, and Matsui grinned widely, giving thumbs-up.

With a uniform number like that, some Yankees' fans might be expecting a double Joe DiMaggio. But the three-time MVP of Japan's Central League only has to hit enough to please owner George Steinbrenner, who is paying Japan's biggest baseball star $21 million over the next three seasons.

"It's tough to project, when he's never played in this league before," Torre said. "He's going to have to get adjusted. Robbie Alomar had trouble last year switching teams in the same country."

Matsui isn't just a player, he's a symbol of Japanese baseball. Former Mayor Rudolph Giuliani sent him a handwritten note welcoming him to the city, and he appeared on David Letterman to read the "Top 10" list for Tuesday night's show. The news conference was televised live in the United States on the Yankees' YES Network and beamed back to Japan, where it was 2 a.m. Wednesday.

Yoshihiro Nishida, Japan's counsel general in New York, was on the podium. In all, 12 people sat alongside Matsui on the dais – four more than the Yankees' current total of starting pitchers.

"Spend a lot of money," Mayor Michael Bloomberg told him. "Goodness, we need the sales-tax revenue. If George is ever going to get a new stadium, you'll have to spend a lot."

Bloomberg, who grew up a fan of the Boston Red Sox, mispronounced the new star's name, calling him "Hi-DEKI" rather than "Hi-DECK-i" and also stumbled over the name of Matsui's former team, the Yomiuri Giants.

Matsui, speaking through a translator, said he would learn English. For now, his best buddy on the Yankees will be second baseman Alfonso Soriano, a Dominican who played in Japan as a teenager and learned the language.

"I would like to try as hard as possible to be one of the team members of the New York Yankees and to be accepted in the city," Matsui said.

Matsui arrived Thursday from Japan to get a physical and complete details of the contract, and he planned to return home Wednesday. One of the first things he did in New York was to visit the World Trade Center site.

"I still can't believe something like that happened," he said. "It does hurt my heart."

On his first day in pinstripes, he gave all the right answers.

"Today has been one of the happiest days of my life," he said. "To be able to come to this beautiful city, New York, and to be able to play for the Yankees, the most beloved team in the city, I am really happy to be here. I want to do everything I can to help the Yankees win the World Series championship."

Torre took a redeye flight from Maui to St. Louis, then caught a connection to White Plains, went home for a shower, shave and a change into coat and tie, and went straight to the news conference. The manager heads right back to Hawaii on Friday for two more weeks of sun and golf.

"I thought it was important," Torre said when asked why he came home for the day.

The 28-year-old Matsui probably will be a left fielder for the Yankees, adding a bat that has produced a .304 career average with 332 homers and 889 RBIs in 1,268 games. He has hit .300 or more in four straight seasons, with at least 36 homers and 95 RBIs. He's walked 100 or more times in four of the last five years, and his addition makes it likely New York will lead the major leagues in runs once again.

The Yankees' clubhouses in Tampa, Fla., and the Bronx figure to be even more crowded, with dozens of Japanese reporters recording Godzilla's every move while Torre figures out how to make eight starting pitchers fit into five slots.

With his left-handed swing and Yankee Stadium's short porch, he could become as big a star as Ichiro, Soriano, Jason Giambi, Bernie Williams, Mariano Rivera and all those starting pitchers. But Matsui wants to be more than a ballplayer.

"If I could somehow act as an ambassador between the two countries in terms of baseball," he said, "I would really be honored."

Torre looks at Matsui and Seattle's Ichiro Suzuki – the 2001 AL MVP – and says the influx of talent from Japan is improving the level of play.

"The game got better in 1947, too, when a guy named Jackie Robinson started changing things," he said.

The many faces of Ebony Pegues

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

Watching Ebony Pegues play basketball is a minute-to-minute affair.

One minute, she'll take the ball down-court, run around recklessly, drive to the inside, and get suffocated by the defense.

In the very next minute, she'll run the court, set up the offense, and drain a 3-pointer to change the momentum of the game.

That's what Ebony Pegues can do to, and for, a team. She is a talented player with a knack for making the great move. Yet she also has a penchant for doing the kinds of things that make coach Marnie Dacko pace faster down the sideline.

As a result, Pegues is simultaneously a vital cog in the Minutewomen offense, and a liability when she gets out of her game.

She has never had to deal with her ups and downs in such an immediate manner as she has this season. Coming into the 2002-03 season, she was averaging 13.3 minutes a game. This season, she's on the floor for an average of 28.3 minutes a night and has responded with a points-per-game average (11.2) that is more than double her career mark. She is also working at a 1.1 assist-to-turnover clip. Prior to this season, she had nearly twice as many turnovers as assists for her career.

Still, she would rather simply be the second guard and let sophomore Katie Nelson run the show on the floor.

"I like to be a background player," Pegues said. "It's different because this season, I'm not really a background player, where as in years past I could just get really hot and just go because the focus has been on Katie and [seniors] Jen [Butler] and Nekole [Smith]. I like to be a background player. I like that a lot, because I'm not the focus of attention, so when I do something good, it's great, and it sparks us."

Even with all her scoring ability, Pegues's defense is still her trademark. The 5-foot-6-inch guard's quick feet keep her in front of most opponents, and she has snatched 20 steals this season, just one short of her total last year. And as she will attest to, her abilities on defense are the building blocks of her offensive prowess.

"I think when I'm playing well, I'm very valuable to this team," she said. "I think it starts with defense. When I'm playing well defensively, my offense just runs wild, and I'm not thinking. I'm just playing. And that is an asset to my team."

On the flip side, if her offense starts to crumble, her focus is visibly shaken. When this happens, her defense suffers. Such is the plight of the guard and her new coach, who repeatedly admonishes Pegues for her inconsistency.

Dacko does, however, see plenty of promise in her, and believes it all comes down to her confidence.

"No one on the bench second-guesses her, she second-guesses herself, she takes herself out of it," Dacko said. "I think she would find satisfaction knowing her teammates could count on her. I think she thinks right now that they can't count on her because of her inconsistency."

The road Ebony Pegues took to the starting guard position is a long and winding one. After lettering four years at Brookhaven High School in Columbus, Ohio, where the Bearcats won the City League North Championship in her senior year, she came to UMass and played 19 games as a freshman.

In her sophomore year, she was averaging 6.3 points and 2.4 rebounds per game. But a trip to Rhode Island at the end of January would prove to be fateful, as she tore her anterior cruciate ligament in a game against the Lady Rams.

She returned the next year to average 17.6 minutes per game, seeing action in 27 contests that season. But she only made four starts, and while she averaged a respectable 5.8 ppg in her junior year, there was no sign that this year would see her become such an integral part of the Minutewomen's plans.

Thus far, she has already eclipsed her previous career highs for points (19) and assists (6), and has done things on the court that make you wonder where she came from, and why she hasn't garnered more attention. Even more impressive is that she's done so on a team led by Butler, who is an Atlantic 10 Player of the Year candidate, and Nekole Smith, who recently scored her 1000th career point. Smith says it comes down to the choices Pegues makes on the court.

"Jen [Butler] and I talk about it all the time," Smith said. "She's such a great player, but sometimes her decision-making [makes us say], 'Eh, come on now, you've got to be smarter than that.' And it drives you nuts, because she is such a good athlete, she's an all-around player. And she'll do it again and again, and it's like, 'three times? Come on.'"

As is the case with many talented players, the main flaw in Pegues's game comes from her head. Her easygoing nature and ability to explode on the court is betrayed by her lack of mental edge, which becomes evident when things start to slip away from her. Pegues and her teammates agree that when she makes a small mistake, it lingers in her mind and keeps her from performing the next time down the court.

"Once she plays carefree and she's not thinking so much, and she doesn't have that look like she's carrying the weight of the world on her shoulders, she can really play great," Smith said.

"Ebony's got to do a better job, if she makes a mistake, of ridding that mistake right then, and she knows that," she added. "She tends to, if she misses a shot, or misses a box out, she'll think about that the next play, and the play after that, and once that happens, we pretty much know she might struggle a little bit."

Dacko, in her first year at the helm of the Minutewomen, has seen the highs and lows of Pegues's season. While she has expressed frustration over Pegues's inconsistency, she still sees plenty of good in what the guard brings to the Maroon and White.

"I think she's a great teammate," Dacko said. "She comes with a lot of energy every day, comes in the office every day. I don't know if it's in her mind, but she certainly has the capability to score a lot of points and build this team up.

"There are times when she's in a slump when I'd like to sit her and start somebody else and have her be the energy and excitement being the sixth player off. I don't want to take away from her confidence by doing that, but I might in fact be taking the pressure off. I'm just waiting for her to have that breakout game. She's electrifying when all the cylinders are firing."

According to Pegues, she has been struggling with her mental inconsistency throughout her career.

"It's always been a problem," she said. "It's a problem I've gotten better at, and my teammates have been very helpful with it. I'm a natural player, and when I start to think, I think about what happened last, or a future play, when I need to be right there, in the present."

She knows that she can cause her coach to start fuming on the bench. She says, however, that it's all part of the package.

"It motivates me because I laugh, because what drives her crazy is that I can play so well, and then I can do something really stupid. It drives her crazy because she has to have me out there in some ways, because I can dominate defensively, and the focus is on me, whether I like it or not. It's funny that I drive her crazy, I drive a lot of coaches crazy."

Would Dacko rather have Pegues as she is, experiencing both extremes in the course of a game, or would she prefer the guard was consistent yet less explosive?

"I'd like to see her be consistent," Dacko said, "because that's something she can build on. It can only raise that level of expectation. I'm sure she doesn't like being in her own shell with such highs and lows, because she second-guesses herself."

Smith would also rather see a more subdued Ebony.

"I'd rather have that solid game," she said. "We don't want those stupid things. If she can just get those 10 points, 12 points, three or four rebounds a game, that's a great night. That's a heck of a night for her, and that's the type of player we need her to be to be a successful basketball team."

Nelson sums up the sentiment of many of the Minutewomen and their fans.

"Anything Ebony can give us in a game is everything we need."

"Responsible Fun"

Not an Oxymoron

Your humanities project is turned in, exams are over and the bags are packed for the trip of a lifetime. As you head to Panama City Beach to bask in the sun, show off that new bathing suit and relax by the emerald-green shore with your friends, keep in mind that we want you to have a great time. On behalf of Panama City Beach, welcome to your spring break!

Panama City Beach hosts over 400,000 students during spring break, and we want each of you to return home with great memories. So, if you've never been to a beach covered with thousands of people from all over the nation, danced in huge dance clubs packed with students, or cruised in lines of maneuvering traffic, you might need some advice. Here are some tips on how to be safe at spring break.

Look out for each other. Be responsible. Don't leave a friend stranded if he or she has had too much to drink

Designate a driver.

Call a cab. (Keep the number in your wallet.)

Watch for careless drivers.

Be careful when walking near roads.

Realize that all drinking laws will be enforced. So, don't drink if you're under 21 and don't drink too much if you are of legal age.

Know the legal limits.

Refuse a drink of any kind from a stranger.

Do not leave your beverage unattended.

Be responsible for your friends.

If you came with a friend, leave with that friend.

Stay with at least one friend at all times. (Remember the "buddy system?")

Feel comfortable, and confident, if you choose not to drink.

Realize it's perfectly acceptable to refuse alcohol and drink non-alcoholic drinks.

Be careful whom you give your room number to.

Be responsible.

Use your head.

Don't just take it from us - the experts agree. Panama City Beach Police Chief, Bob Harding offers a key piece of advice, "Look out for each other. Be responsible. Don't leave a friend stranded if he or she has had too much to drink."

Toni Gauthier, a substance abuse specialist and the associate director of counseling services at Nazareth College in Rochester, NY, adds, "If you choose to drink, please do so in a healthful way, a way that doesn't put you, or someone else, at risk. Not everyone drinks. Choosing not to drink is a perfectly acceptable and increasingly common decision."

A final thought. We sincerely welcome you to Panama City Beach. Get a tan, get a souvenir, meet new people, dance 'till the sun comes up. But please, be safe. Be careful. Be smart. And enjoy your stay on "The World's Most Beautiful Beaches."

Escape winter at Panama City Beach

Spring Break

And there is no better place for that than Panama City Beach. Recently named the No. 1 spring break spot in the country by the Travel Channel, the world's most beautiful beaches have all you need to escape those winter doldrums.

Panama City Beach has plenty of sun, girls and guys, beaches, clubs, eateries, and things to do when you're not on the beaches.

Take a close look at PC Beach:

Sun. There's lots of that. The average air temperature in February and March is 70° the average year-round temp is 78° and that sure beats 27 in Madison, Wis.

Beaches. No problem there, either. There are 27 miles of beach, which means there is plenty of room. And, over the years, PC Beach has won many awards for the quality of its sugary, white beaches.

Hotels and condos. You can't really party without them. And, since the Panama City Beach Convention & Visitors Bureau estimates that more than 400,000 visitors from all over the Midwest, East and Southeast will be there over the six weeks of spring break, there won't be a shortage.

Fish (and not the kind you date). Panama City Beach is known as the Seafood Capital of the World by those who live there year-round, and it has a myriad of colorful restaurants.

Clubs. PC Beach has them, too, in abundance for all tastes and many right on the beach. Everything from heavy metal to the golden oldies. PCB boasts some of the world's largest clubs and the hottest spring break nightlife anywhere.

Want to enjoy the break without the heavy party scene? Panama City Beach is right for you, too. There are wonderful outdoor activities, such as golf and tennis, plus a zoo and amusement parks, museums and arcades.

After being cooped up all winter, perhaps you'll want to be more active. How about hiking, camping, swimming, diving, boating, fishing, windsurfing or sailing? It's all there on the Gulf of Mexico and St. Andrews Bay.

In addition, all during spring break many corporations sponsor a variety of activities. There's plenty of live music, wild stage contests, and lots of great new products to try out. You'll be amazed by all the free stuff you can collect.

Maybe you're worried about having someplace to stay. That shouldn't be a problem Panama City Beach has more than 20,000 hotel, motel and condominium units available.

Florida's Coastal Northwest is also easy to get to by air and is within easy driving distance from almost anywhere in the Southeast.

So, what are you waiting for? Panama City Beach is waiting to welcome you.

State of the Union heralds war

By RON FOURNIER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) - Building a case for war against Iraq, President Bush said Tuesday night he has fresh evidence that Saddam Hussein seeks to "dominate, intimidate or attack" with weapons of mass destruction that he could share with terrorist allies. He pledged to "fight with the full force and might of the United States military," if necessary, to disarm Iraq.

"A future lived at the mercy of terrible threats is no peace at all," Bush said in a State of the Union address delivered before Congress and broadcast live around the world.

For the first time since the Sept. 11 attacks transformed him into a wartime president, Bush faced the nation amid serious questions about his leadership. Most Americans don't approve of his handling of the economy, polls indicate, and only a bare majority support his policies on Iraq – an area where the president enjoyed support of more than 80 percent a year ago.

The first half of Bush's hour-long address was devoted to domestic policy, a reflection of his desire not to let Iraq overshadow a presidential agenda geared toward the 2004 re-election campaign. The heart of Bush's package is his $674 billion plan to revive the economy and a $400 billion, 10-year proposal to overhaul Medicare, sprinkled with initiatives to combat AIDS, produce energy-efficient cars and give religious groups access to federal community service money.

After an address interrupted 77 times by applause, Democrats challenged Bush's efforts both at home and abroad.

"Tonight, the president used all the right rhetoric, but he still has all the wrong policies," said Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said he would introduce a resolution requiring Bush to present "convincing evidence of an imminent threat" before sending troops to fight Iraq.

"Instead of rushing down the path to war with Iraq, the American people deserve a full debate," Kennedy said in a written statement.

Bush offered no new evidence to support his charges, he said Secretary of State Colin Powell will go to the U.N. Security Council next Wednesday to present the U.S. case.

"We will consult, but let there be no misunderstanding: If Saddam Hussein does not fully disarm for the safety of our people, and for the peace of the world, we will lead a coalition to disarm him," the president said. Key allies, including France and Germany, oppose military action in Iraq and want Bush to give U.N. weapons inspectors more time.

Hoping to sway reluctant allies, Bush presented a laundry list of Saddam's alleged offenses, some of them newly revealed to the public. He said intelligence sources have reported that thousands of Iraqi personnel are at work hiding documents and materials from the U.N. weapons inspectors.

Specifically, Bush said Saddam has not accounted for up to 25,000 liters of anthrax, 38,000 liters of botulinum toxin, 500 tons of sarin, mustard gas and VX nerve agent and more than 30,000 munitions capable of delivering chemical weapons.

"If this is not evil, then evil has no meaning," Bush said.

The speech was delivered amid intense security as lawmakers, Cabinet members, military leaders and Supreme Court justices gathered in the House chamber. Several hundred people massed on the Capitol lawn to protest Bush's policies, ranging from a possible war in Iraq to his approach to health care.

The president described the nation as still recovering from recession, terrorist attacks, corporate scandals and stock market declines. "Our economy is recovering, yet it is not growing fast enough or strongly enough," the president said.

He proposed spending new money for research to develop hydrogen-powered cars and to tutor children of prison inmates. He also called for a new $600 million drug treatment program in which federal money could go to religious community service programs.

In a nod to his conservative backers, Bush called on Congress to ban a procedure critics call "partial-birth" abortions and human cloning.

While Osama bin Laden and other key terrorists still elude capture, the president said the United States has caught many key commanders of al-Qaida and suggested others had been killed - "met a different fate," in his words.

Citing intelligence sources, secret communications "and statements by people now in custody," Bush renewed his assertion that Saddam aids and protects terrorists, including members of al-Qaida.

"Secretly, without fingerprints, he could provide one of his hidden weapons to terrorists or help them develop their own," Bush said.

Bush said Saddam has shown "his utter contempt" for the United Nations and must be brought to account unless he disarms.

"The dictator of Iraq is not disarming. To the contrary, he is deceiving," the president said.

"If war is forced upon us, we will fight in a just cause and by just means sparing, in every way we can, the innocent. And if war is forced upon us, we will fight with the full force and might of the United States military and we will prevail," he said.

Among his charges:

-The British government has learned that Saddam recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa.

-Iraqi officials are hiding documents and materials, and intelligence officers are posing as scientists that inspectors are supposed to interview.

-Three Iraqi defectors say Iraq had several mobile biological weapons labs in the 1990s that are now not accounted for.

"Year after year, Saddam Hussein has gone to elaborate

Sit Down is out of commission

Owner disappears without reason or explanation

By DAN LAMOTHE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The place has been cold and dark since the end of December, and nobody is left to answer why.

Late last month, Sit Down Diner owner James Tourtillotte told his employees that he would be closing the establishment down for about a week to make some general repairs to the building.

Tourtillotte has disappeared, and the popular 1940's-themed diner, a hit with college students in the area, has not been open since.

"We were told that we were going to close the restaurant for repairs," Eileen Johnson, a server at the diner from Montague, said. "January's a full month...it seemed like a good time to do it."

Johnson said that Tourtillotte told his staff that they were going to have a week off while structural repairs were made to several parts of the business, including ripped seat cushions and a broken window.

Employees said those repairs never happened. Instead, Tourtillotte allegedly called the three managers of the diner, spending an estimated five minutes on the phone with each.

"He didn't give us any information," Elizabeth Wentzel, a manager, said. "It was a brief five minute conversation."

Wentzel said that Tourtillotte did not call any of the other employees other than the managers.

"I probably contacted about 85 percent of them," she said. "I tried to contact most of them."

"He said they'd send the check in the mail, and that was it," Johnson said. "We didn't get an explanation, nothing."

About 50 part- and full-time employees lost their jobs, according to Johnson.

"A lot of them were great employees," Wentzel said. "Now they're stuck without a job for no reason."

Wentzel said that most of the staff was college students, with a few high school students working at the diner as well.

"It was a good atmosphere," she said. "It was great working with everybody. It's too bad it had to happen."

The Sit Down Diner, a popular restaurant among college students located on Route 9, has mysteriously closed leaving patrons and employees wondering why.

Gone out of his way to go

Johnson said that in retrospect, there were several easily overlooked signs that pointed to Tourtillotte not continuing with the Sit Down Diner.

Tourtillotte changed his cell phone number in December, leaving employees with no other way to contact him than through his wife, Johnson said. She also said that he did several other things that didn't make sense in retrospect had he planned on keeping the business open, such as letting the food supplies run down more than necessary.

Johnson said that a big clue should have been Tourtillotte refusing to receive a shipment of paper goods for the restaurant.

"He told the truck to take it back," she said.

Johnson said that they didn't think much of it, thinking that Tourtillotte must have had plans to keep the shelves empty during the remodeling.

Wentzel said that the liquor license also was not renewed at the end of December.

"The beer and wine license wasn't renewed," she said. "But we didn't know it wasn't going to be renewed."

Johnson also said that managers were told not to deposit money the last week the diner was open.

"He said he was planning to pay for the repairs with cash," she said.

The plot thickens

Since the diner's closing, no one normally in contact with Tourtillotte

UMass professor aids commuters in Big Dig routing

By AMY O'NEILL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After years of construction and billions of dollars spent, "The Big Dig" is finally being opened to the public, and commuters are faced with the complicated task of figuring out how to operate the new system. Thanks to University of Massachusetts Professor Donald Fisher and his assistants, that task has been made easier.

The Web Big Dig Drive is a virtual version of the Big Dig tunnels and highways created to show drivers how to navigate the new system in hopes that it will increase driver confidence and reduce confusion.

Fisher's research began at the Human Performance Laboratory, a facility that holds a driving simulator in which a sedan is placed before three screens where highways and neighborhoods are projected.

The "car" reads the driver's speed, direction and eye movements as input. Other research projects being performed at the lab include determining optimal signage for the Big Dig, teaching younger drivers to anticipate dangerous situations on the road and determining the safety of voice-activated car phones.

Fisher said that this particular project is the first collaboration between a driving simulator lab and a major federal construction project.

"Putting a test drive on the Web makes sense because it reduces the potential for accidents," Fisher said.

On the Web Big Dig, all of the Central Artery tunnel sections of Interstate 93 north and southbound are detailed. They extend one and a half miles in each direction. Also detailed is the Massachusetts Turnpike, Interstate 90, starting at the Prudential Center and heading eastbound under the Four Point Channel and through South Boston to the portal of the Ted Williams Tunnel.

Interstate 93, south of the Massachusetts Turnpike and also heading under Four Point Channel to the portal of the Ted Williams Tunnel, will soon be on the site as well.

To use the site, drivers can log onto www.ecs.umass.edu/hpl and click on the Big Dig button on the left side. Drivers then can choose which route they would like to test-drive.

According to Fisher, the website offers all details about the routes that drivers would need including signage, pavement markers and side barriers.

"We've included not only drivable surfaces but also visible elements, so that 'driving' a virtual car through the Web site will give people as realistic a sense of the new roadways as possible, before they actually get there," Fisher said.

In addition to helping commuters who are trying to get to work on time, they are hoping to help travelers to Boston and those headed to Logan Airport. The Web site is aimed at helping to familiarize drivers with interchanges that may be confusing during a driver's first few times in the area.

"Roughly 250,000 people each day take Interstate 93 north to Callahan Tunnel and Logan airport," Fisher said. "This route will no longer be available once the new construction opens. Those people need to know where they are going.

"Drivers will go through a period of adjustment, getting accustomed to the new routes, entrances and exits. This is an effort at helping them get comfortable with the details of those routes ahead of time. We want people to know the way without injuring themselves or others, or dealing with the inconvenience of missing an exit."

CDSJ team's survey work continues

By S.J. Port
Collegian Staff

The Community Diversity and Social Justice Team (CDSJ) believe that they will complete their surveys and analysis by the end of the semester.

Surveys have gone out and come back from three of the five administrative divisions that are being surveyed by the team about the climate around issues of diversity at the University of Massachusetts. The five areas are the Chancellor's area, University development, Administration and Finance, Student Affairs and Academic Affairs. Each area has a team from CDSJ who are coordinating the surveys and doing the initial analysis of the data returned. The surveys are four to five pages in length and have been given to employees and faculty either in printed mail form or in sit-down sessions within their departments. The first three pages of the survey, according to Grant Ingle part of the University CDSJ team or Central team, are comparatively similar for all areas, except for the survey received by academic affairs which has "wording changes" different from the rest.

The four and fifth pages are different for each division. They are more open-ended, according to Ingle. Diane Flaherty, Chair of the CDSJ Team, said that there is also room for those taking the survey to add their own questions and answers that they feel are appropriate to their division and were unmentioned in the body of the general survey.

Ingle, who created the team's web page, explained that the University has "20 years of amazing data from students" due to the work of Project Pulse which conduct a different phone survey each semester of undergraduates living on campus for the University, but that there is little to no data from employees or faculty.

Ingle and Diane Flaherty, Chair of the CDSJ team explained that the survey is of the climate within which employees work at the University in regards to the communities diversity and justice. The surveys are anonymous, however, if a division has a severe minority of one race, or sex it could easily become apparent whose survey they were looking at, a possibility that could change how people answer survey questions.

"This is big," Ingle said. "We had to promise a lot of confidentiality to get people to do this. What you put on a survey like this as a 20-year employee is going to be very different than what you write as a student. It ups the ante, and the laws and logic and sensitivity involved with the data that will be collected are much more complicated."

"It's a climate survey," Ingle said. "We are taking a look at the campus climate, at its strengths and weaknesses."

The survey is an attempt by the University to help students by working to improve the work environment for professors, advisors, janitors, dining hall workers and other employees who interact with students.

"We know that how undergraduates are treated is a function of how employees are treated," Ingle said.

Thus far surveys from the Chancellor's area, Administration and Finance and University development have been completed. Ingle says that Academic Affairs is close to finishing their surveys and that surveys went out to Student Affairs last week. Ingle noted that some areas were and have expected to finish their surveys and primary analysis quicker than others simply because they are smaller divisions.

Currently the "action happens with executive area teams," Flaherty explained. "We are just beginning to put it all together now."

Each division's team that has surveys completed is now working to gather the data and members are attending training sessions to understand the data once it is gathered and organized.

"It is really a decentralized and consultative process," Flaherty said.

Flaherty says that once the preliminary data is back they will work to figure out if there is any data missing. Ingles agreed, saying that after reports come out there will be a period of monitoring and most likely a resurvey in 2-3 years to fill in gaps in data and to see if the survey has yielded results and changes decided upon have improved the campus climate.

Each division will publish its own report based on their areas findings, and then, according to Flaherty, the Central team will review all the reports together and do an overview report, putting the data into context for the University as a whole.

For Ingle, the idea of having five different sets of data is important. Information can be broken down by division. The survey does not become an advisory tool; instead, it becomes a main administrative office on how to make changes for the rest of the body involved.

"There will be five different sets of data-there is some merit to that," Ingle said. "The survey process is driving the change process down the ladder to the local level, however we will still have some float up to the system level-some changes that have to be made at the University level."

UMass, Ingle explained, has a history of being in "crisis driven mode" for responses to diversity and social issues that arise on campus.

"The old way was that highly centralized advising groups of blue ribbon advisors worked with the chancellor's office and we can't have blue ribbon guys make the changes for the camps. We must have people who are going to be implementing the changes to be part of the decision making process about those changes."

Ingle hopes that after the survey results are published and changes are implemented this upcoming fall and spring that the University will go from being "crisis driven to information driven."

The surveys were constructed by the Student Assessment Research Evaluation Office (SAREA formerly SARIS). SAREA will also do most of the analysis of the compiled data.

Sit Down Diner mystery unsolved after January closing has admitted to being in touch with him, and leads on his location are few.

Since the sudden closing, the Tourtillottes have not returned phone calls to their home in West Simsbury, Conn.

"He changed his cell phone and he won't answer emails," Johnson said.

Another Sit Down Diner in Danbury, Conn., also owned by Tourtillotte, has closed under similar circumstances. The business numbers for both the diner in Hadley and the diner in Danbury have been disconnected. Frank Latucca, a University of Massachusetts professor in Hotel and Restaurant Administration, who worked with the couple as they began the business, offered no help.

"I respect the privacy of my alumni and my students, and therefore, I have no comment," he said.

Moving on

Employees have done the best they can to keep in touch since the closing, according to Johnson.

"We've tried to be in touch and let everyone know," she said. "He didn't take the opportunity to care about how we find out."

Johnson also said that she isn't sure what her next move will be, but that she wants to stay in the restaurant business.

"January is a horrible month to look for a job," she said. "We're hoping to be able to collect, but we don't know what our next move is."

Wentzel also said that she wants to stay in the restaurant business, and that she will be interviewing with Chili's in West Springfield soon.

"I don't know why he didn't want us to know," Johnson said. "He had no decency to any of us."

Bush addresses potential Iraqi war in State of the Union

lengths, spent enormous sums, taken great risks, to build and keep weapons of mass destruction – but why? The only possible use he could have for those weapons is to dominate, intimidate or attack," Bush said, warning that Saddam could "resume his ambitions of conquest in the Middle East."

Next week, Powell will allege that not only was Iraq hiding chemical and biological weapons from U.N. inspectors but smuggling in technology for long-range missile and nuclear weapons programs, a senior U.S. official said.

"The world has waited 12 years for Iraq to disarm," Bush said. "America will not accept a serious and mounting threat to our country, our friends and our allies."

Bush did not repeat his assertion that Iraq, Iran and North Korea are an "axis of evil," a phrase he coined in last year's address. But he chided Iran for repressing its people and said North Korea has deceived the world about its nuclear ambitions.

Bush announced a federal center where all terrorism intelligence, foreign and domestic, will be analyzed. CIA Director George Tenet will oversee the operation, two administration officials said.

He proposed spending $6 billion to make vaccines against anthrax, botulism, Ebola and the plague more readily available.

He proposed a $15 billion plan for emergency AIDS relief in Africa, a "work of mercy" that he said would save millions of Africans from falling victim to the deadly virus.

Top GOP congressional leaders sounded eager to get to work on Bush's legislative agenda. "We're about to get this ball rolling," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois. "We're ready to go," agreed Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee.

In keeping with tradition, a guest box in the galleries overlooking the House chamber was filled with living testimonials to the president's message.

This year's roster of guests included six people who the White House said would benefit from Bush's tax-cut proposal, two doctors described as hurt by high malpractice insurance costs and several people affiliated with aid organizations.

One gallery seat was to be left empty to symbolize "the empty place many Americans will always have" because of the September 2001 attacks, which led to last year's war against the Taliban and allied al-Qaida.

Domestic agenda importance: Priorities lie at home

With the State of the Union speech delivered last night, America has been readily reminded of the many issues going on abroad. Saddam Hussein continues to fester in the Middle East with the masses of the nation of Iraq pledging full and unflinching support.

There is the ever-present threat of terrorism that has been felt in America over the past 17 months, though nobody is exactly sure where the danger could come from, or when.

Obviously people across the country are worried about the state of the world and the international arena in which we are all players. Our leaders in Washington have made sure that these thoughts are in the forefront of their policies and actions.

Yet at the same time, an even bigger concern on the minds of most citizens is the state of affairs within our own borders. There is the usual social unrest that always seems to persist. Added to it though is the worst economic crisis the United States has faced in the past two decades.

Consumer confidence has plummeted and thus spending is down. While President Bush touts the need for more and more tax cuts, to give money back to the average person, most don't feel like doing anything with that excess cash except stowing it underneath the mattress. Our economy is not going to get out of its nosedive without Joe Public putting cash into the machine.

Ordinary citizens are not the only ones experiencing dire financial times. Our states are mired in billions of dollars of debt. We are very familiar with Mitt Romney's spreadsheet for the Commonwealth, but we are hardly alone. The state of Oregon is $2 billion in the red and thus might have to cut a whole month of the school year. Essential programs across the country face the axe as there is simply no money left to supply the necessary funding.

With the people of America and their state governments in need, the federal government does not seem to be keeping up its part of the bargain.

Rather than trimming taxes, our leaders should be taking full advantage of every dollar they receive and using it to help out those states and people who simply can't provide for the most basic of needs. However, whether the total pot of money shrinks in size or not, the government should also be allocating its expenses better.

Ever since our country was attacked, people have been afraid of what may be next. While this is a legitimate fear, it is one that has also been played by those in power. Americans are afraid that their own security is threatened. With the fear, the President has tried to justify taking money necessary for domestic agenda and diverting it to his ongoing war with the rest of the world. This cannot continue if our country hopes to escape its current economic plight.

International politics and national security are, without a doubt, important and pressing issues. They do not trump domestic economic vitality. If the present path is followed, America may very well enhance its position in respect to the rest of the world, while within it suffocates.

The mistake in the corner office

Gilad Skolnick

This winter vacation, while you were sipping your hot chocolate and spending your hours and hours of free time scrolling up and down your buddy list to read everyone's away messages, I was still recovering from the brutal process of registration, and your governor was having a fun time deciding how many hundreds of millions of dollars he was going to cut from our fine institute of higher education.

It's about time we had some more budget cuts. I was worried for a second that our library would be able to renew its subscriptions and be able to buy books again, that University of Massachusetts security would be able to escort people at night, and that our professors would get the salaries that their contracts promised them. The Boston Globe reported that Romney is eyeing to cut around half a billion to 600 million dollars from higher education, because the world would come to an end if he (God forbid) increased the income tax by a point of a percent.

Education is crucial to the advancement of our society to us and to our values, but apparently the future of tens of thousands of UMassians doesn't fit in with Romney's agenda. UMass is sadly at the bottom of the list when it comes to how much money the school gets from the state, only ahead of New Hampshire. Nowadays a degree is so crucial to get ahead in the competitive job market that many countries such as Canada provide higher education for free. That one class that you couldn't get into during registration could be that class that convinces you to switch your major from accounting to food science and become a world famous chocolate connoisseur.

I can sort of understand why someone would want to vote republican when it comes to national elections, as issues such as foreign policy and the environment come into play, but what is a UMass student saying by voting for a republican governor? Romney doesn't believe in most republican ideas other than cutting money from people who need it. He says that he's pro-choice, against the death penalty, and his stances regarding the international arena are irrelevant being a governor. Having had the democratic governor of Utah praise him is evidence enough that most of his stances are not republican.

"And surely Romney would do little to correct the damage done by Swift who worked so hard to balance the budget for him."

And surely Romney would do little to correct the damage done by Swift who worked so hard to balance the budget for him. Poor people don't need to go to the dentist anyway (she cut a program that let people have dental work done who couldn't afford it), and mentally ill people don't need to be taken care of either (a substantial amount of money has been cut from this field as well). Over the past year UMass "fees" have increased by thousands of dollars, parking space costs have continued skyrocketed, and everything else has been cut. Anyone who was trying to save their family money by voting for Romney will end up costing their family even more through hikes in their "fees" (tuition). Maybe it's just me, but I've always learned that it's preferable to pay less than more for the same thing.

The most hypocritical thing is to support a party to govern the state that has shown to have no problem with cutting money from UMass in the past. Anyone can tell that our school is far from having a problem with excess funding, unless you go on one of those campus tours where they tell you that everything is alright (and that the DC food is amazing). During registration every class was full, and those that still had room filled up within hours of me getting into the class.

With a decent amount of funding UMass could pay current teachers what their contract promises them, raises could also be given, and more teachers to reduce the overload could be hired. In Romney's campaign he said that he was for education, and he has indeed shown himself to be very pro education, private education that is. Although those forty grand a year schools do look tempting, I don't think I'll get a scholorship due to my excellence in bobsledding and I'd rather not owe 160 thousand when I get out of school.

So when you don't get into your class during add drop or next time you complain about a 500 person lecture, remember who you voted for. Sorry for making all you Romeny fans feel guilty, there's always 2006.

The fundamentals of family

Jim Piermarini

I left Amherst and headed for my hometown in December like most of you, expecting to eat some good food, see good people and enjoy the time off. Over the years I've built a routine for the holidays that lacked a lot of the meaning that should have been involved in it all. I'd put on a nice sweater and make sure to give all my aunts and uncles hugs, and make especially sure to give my grandparents one. I'd go through the general predictable motions and eventually return the hugs when it was time to say good-bye. Very concise, very consistent and very easy to follow.

It always seemed to me that a lot of the spirit that was supposed to be embodied by the holiday season was merely a marketing fluke to get people to bust their banks in the name of the economy. On that note, the hype that surrounded Christmas had never quite been lived up to, and I usually left feeling bad that my parents had spent so much money trying to make me happy. I've never considered myself a very materialistic person, so Christmas had grown to be a flatly routine occasion with many perks, but nonetheless felt forced. Until this year.

For almost a year before Christmas I had conversed back and forth with my cousin who was stationed in Afghanistan in the Air Force. Growing up he had been one of my best friends and was actually born 15 or so hours before me, in the same hospital. I often think of how that must have been an amazing time for my father and his brother, to be both having children in the same hospital, with in the same day.

Since Sept. 11, 2001, and more recently with the pressure for war, I've been scared for my cousin. I knew that any day he could be killed in action, and for all of you who have family in the military, you know that feeling isn't great at all, especially now. I began to appreciate the times we shared and often told him how he was always more of a brother to me than anything. Through all of this, it had crossed my mind that there's no reason why I shouldn't have been equally appreciative of him while he was home, and that there's no time to hold back feelings with people who are important to you.

While he's been away, our grandfather has had some major health problem. With two bypass heart surgeries as well as recent traces of cancer, he has been having a hard time. His time with us is no longer guaranteed. Like my cousin at war. I fear that I have no time to waste in appreciating his life, and conveying that appreciation and love. Since his health problems began to worsen these past few years, his children have all moved close to home to be with him, and the general sense of family has grown immensely. Perhaps it had always been there, but I just hadn't quite realized it.

As we sat around the dinner table this Christmas, my cousin was home on break from the Air Force, my grandfather was feeling well enough to act his regular self, and the entire family was there for both them and for us all with a true sense of appreciation. The smiles were more sincere, the hugs were slightly tighter, and the stories ran deep. My grandfather took out a 50-year-old bottle of Anisette his father had purchased from Italy. He was saving it for a special occasion, and with everyone together for the first time in years, and possibly the last time ever, there was no time as good as the present for all to take a taste.

For a moment we all shared a piece of history and silently set the foundation for our future as a family. He told us stories of his parents' journey to America, and how they and he had both worked their way from nothing to earn what they had. When my uncle said the prayer at dinner there were no snickers or side comments. We all listened as he spoke on our behalf, in giving thanks for the food and the times we shared. He mentioned both my cousin in the Air Force and my grandfather. He mentioned how we need to come together in small groups as families to lift the human spirit in a time where war consumes most of the world. He brought forth honest wishes for peace and widespread recognition of the lives we get to live, and the people we get to share them with. He asked for a peaceful resolution to the recent problems our world faces, and for the people who are a part of it to recognize the delicate nature of life and the potential we all possess.

For the first time in my life everything seemed to come together. I forgot about school and my pursuit of a successful career. I forgot about the New Year's Eve tickets for Phish that I had practically fought for. I forgot about my 21st birthday, which was less than two weeks away. My mind and heart were flooded and overwhelmed by the very things that life should be all about. I truly felt the power that the family can possess and finally realized why we get to spend two months trying to find it.

When people asked me how my Christmas was and if I got anything cool, I found myself speaking only about the family gathering and how special it had been. I had actually gotten less gifts this Christmas than I had received for any other Christmas, but was happy about that in the end. I didn't need for these people to give me things to understand the connection. I could feel it. It had been there all along, and even when we can't all be together, it will still be there in all of us. So as I said my good-byes to my cousin who is back off to Baghdad, my grandfather, and the rest of my family, I saw them all in a completely different light.

Life is not a promise. It is often too short, very complicated, and equally confusing. The things that remain and never change are where you come from and whom you are a part of. And in a world where we are beginning to take ourselves places where these values no longer hold the importance they once did, it's important for us all to take a step back and appreciate one another. The people you share life with are the very component that makes life what it is. We can learn so much from one another, and half of that is opening up to the true feelings involved.

This Christmas break I learned to love my family and friends whether they're by my side or across the world. It only takes a simple leap of faith and three seconds to tell a good friend or family member how much they mean to you, but often takes a lifetime to realize it.

There is so much to live for, it's just sad that many people wait until it's too late to truly appreciate it. I truly felt the Christmas spirit this year just how it was meant to be felt, and as this New Year and new school year begins, I will try to take that feeling with me, and spread it when I can. Enjoy your youth. Enjoy your freedom. Enjoy your friends and your family. The rewards will follow.

A weird level of comfort

Regan McKendry

Work should be fun. It's an ideal world. Of course, the point of work is to make money and perform a service of some kind. This is basic. Yet work should also be a place where we have friends, people with whom we share our stories (our successes and our fakes). Most of the time, my work fits that mold. Unfortunately, I was recently on the wrong end of a workers calling to understand playful humor.

For the past four and a half years I've worked at the mall. I love my job. The store I work at and the people I call my co-workers, though most of them deserve the title of friends. Over that time we've shared many laughs often due to our own self behavior.

One thing I've also become accustomed to is being open about my sexuality at work. Retail is an industry that usually has a higher percentage of gays than normal. For clothing stores, the percentage often rises. Even though there is a long held assumption that every guy who works at the Gap is gay, my store definitely bucks the trend. We've got a miniscule amount. I'm fine with that though. The straight guys who work for us do a good job and are great people. All are also pretty open minded to alternative lifestyles or so I thought.

Two weeks ago I had to have a discussion with another one of my mangers. I'm a supervisor myself. Turns out it was about sexual harassment and making people "uncomfortable" at the workplace. She gave me two examples from the previous two weeks.

After a 15-20 minute discussion about homosexuality, one guy asked me that if I met him on the street, would I think that he was gay. Now he's an attractive man, so my response in text was no. I wouldn't think that he was gay, but that rather I'd be mad he wasn't. It was a subtle compliment and nothing more. He reported to the other manager that it made him uncomfortable, he didn't have the guts to tell me himself. And do any of you actually think that if a girl had complimented him on his looks that he would have felt weird?

"The heterosexuals in the world are just going to have to shut up and deal..."

The other scenario is even more outrageous. In the backroom a female employee in horseplay grabbed the rear end of a male employee. I was there and we all joked about it, culminating with me saying that I wish I had grabbed his butt.

Now he didn't care about that comment at all, but someone standing nearby overheard it and apparently it did not sit well with them.

With these two instances, I not only had to have a discussion with my manager about what is appropriate behavior for work, but also written documentation in my permanent file that such an issue existed in the first place. It's an understatement to say that I'm aggravated to no end.

Examining both situations reveals one clear-cut distinction that creates that feeling of weirdness: the idea of homosexuality was presented. If it had been a heterosexual compliment towards the guy, or just a female grabbing a male's ass, nothing would have happened. Though each technically could be construed as harassment, everyone at work would have realized the innocence of each scenario. Add homosexuality to the mix and all of a sudden people start to feel "weird."

I have an answer to all those whom think homosexuality weirds them out. Grow up. Welcome to the 21st century people. Gay people have been a part of our world since the dawn of man and day-by-day, more and more are coming out. The heterosexuals in the world are just going to have to shut up and deal.

There was a time when if a black woman complimented a white man's appearance, that a similar discomfort would have existed. Though still the case in some places, much of society has moved beyond this prejudice and evolved. People must learn to have the same open mind when it comes to homosexuality. Simply because a guy tells another guy that he's good looking doesn't mean that he wants to go jump in the sack. Or when a guy is saying he wishes he could do what a girl just did in jest, in the same playful manner, there is no need to read into those actions any further. Eventually people will get to that point (I hope), and the sooner the better.

Meanwhile, I'll continue with my job at the mall. I'll simply have to keep myself in check and be sure to not let any possible misconceptions slip out of my mouth. I'll be putting on a front. I won't be a happy person. But at least, God forbid, there won't be any people made to feel "weird" about homosexuality.

Monty Brogan (Edward Norton) is about to go to jail for seven long years, but before he does, he enjoys one last night with friends, including Mary (Anna Paquin) Jacob Elinsky (Philip Seymour Hoffman), his girlfriend, Naturelle (Rosario Dawson), and Slaughtery (Barry Pepper) in "25th Hour."

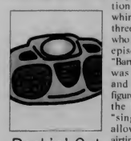
'25th Hour,' much ado about nothing

By JAKE D. LEWIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Edward Norton has shown through many fine choices that he has talent and he's here to stay. Like fellow actors Tom Hanks or Robert DeNiro, Norton has an air about him that audiences love whether he's playing a pathetic loser, a hotshot cop, a reformed Neo-Nazi or bad-ass drug dealer as he does in the new Spike Lee film, "25th Hour."

Please pardon the existentialism, but what are movies all about? This was a question that kept running through my mind while watching "25th Hour," because I didn't see a clear storyline. The plot of the movie is easy enough: Monty Brogan (Norton) gets busted for dealing drugs, and is being sent to prison.

'25th Hour'
Directed by Spike Lee
Starring: Edward Norton, Rosario Dawson
Studio name
Rated R
104 mins.



The movie focuses on the last evening before he's thrown into the slammer as he tries to resolve who ratted him out, as well as spend time with his few friends and dear old dad. Some may say that that sounds like a story to them, but I saw very little progression throughout the film, and no real point to anything that was going on. Norton's getting sent up is established in the first 10 minutes, and his suspicion over who turned him in is mostly taken care of by the halfway point. What then? We're left with a subplot about a teacher who has an unhealthy crush on a promiscuous student; a stockbroker who can't perform inside or outside of the officer despite his cool facade; and a minor detour exploring the relationship with Monty's dad (Brian Cox), a washed-up police officer who now owns a neighborhood pub. Cox, in my mind, is one of the best character actors ever, and the movie only starts to show promise at the end when Cox gives a monologue to his son about how life can change in ways no one expects, all depending on the path you take.

That's the obligatory, sappy monologue, but it works, even though it's about two minutes too long. Then there's the obligatory Spike Lee monologue. Just like in "Do the Right Thing," and tenfold with Malcolm X as well as other Spike Lee "joints" (as he likes to call his films), Norton's Monty sounds off about all the people in NYC that he hates, hitting every race, religion, color, sexual preference, creed, and so on. How does this really apply to the movie at hand? Again, I point you to my theory that "25th Hour" really isn't about anything, and I only think this scene is present because Lee likes showing how much he detests people, but doing it in an artsy-fartsy way, as well as perhaps giving the only illumination of how angry Monty is inside for the time he's about to serve. But then again, none of the groups he rants about were responsible for getting him locked up, so what's the point?

When jumping backwards and forwards in time in a movie, the parameters must be clear, and they're anything but that in "25th Hour," the editing of the film, by Barry Alexander Brown, being a complete mess. We see Monty return home, in the afternoon, where he's invited to take a bath with his girlfriend Naturelle (Dawson). He obliges. Now it's nighttime outside. They're interrupted by the entrance of cops to arrest Monty for possession of drugs. Where the continuity starts to lose us is the next scene, where Monty is back on his couch as he was before the sensuous soak, and he decides to go back out to meet a friend, as it is again daylight out. Was he or wasn't he arrested? We later see a scene with him in a holding cell, but we never see him released. Do the police arrest you, release, arrest you, and release you? That's what

The Used worse than name tells

Rockin' Out
Samara Marblestone

It's official. I heard the most annoying sound ever on the radio over winter break.

Want to hear about it?

It's okay, I'll tell you anyway.

I heard a dragged out, male voice that sounded like the voice was in-between the transition of adolescence to adulthood. Don't let me forget to mention how it whined like a three-year-old who missed an episode of "Barney." As I was driving and tried to figure out how the hell this "singer" was allowed any airtime on the radio, the song finally ended.

What an amazing feeling. I was also pretty stoked that my windshield didn't crack from the noise pollution that I stupidly subjected it to.

So anyway, the DJ announced that this new band was called The Used.

What an attractive name to slap onto such an attractive sound.

Much like the name of their band, lead vocalist Bert McCracken, guitarist Quinn Allman, bassist Jeph Howard and drummer Branden Steineckert do look pretty used. Dude, I know that they're all about the music, but please — for the sake of sanity and cleanliness, a shower wouldn't hurt. We'll get back to that later.

Reprise Records released the group's self-titled debut album on June 25 of last year, along with its hit single "The Taste of Ink." As much as I hate to admit it, its single does have a good

Phish return to form

By MATTHEW DESPRES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Welcome to "Round Room" – the Phish album with the five o'clock shadow.

The much discussed hiatus that found the members of Phish plugging into alternative musical outlets ended, of course, last year. Trey Anastasio wrapped up his orchestral leanings, bassist Mike Gordon premiered the final cut of "Rising Low," the Gov't Mule documentary, and keys player Page McConnell packed away the well received Vida Blue. The boys were back. But what did they look like? What would they sound like?

Phish
'Round Room'
Elektra

Phish. Exactly like Phish. And, after a few spins, it's clear that's where they wanted – and needed – to be.

The pleasures in an album like "Round Room" are its decidedly non-studio qualities. Missed countoffs and behind the eight-ball edits toss a sense of joyful simplicity into the wind – the band is trying itself back on for size. Maybe some things don't fit as well, maybe some do. In any case, as they jam the cobwebs off, they're having a hell of a lot of fun watching themselves in the process.

The 11-minute girth of "Pebbles and Marbles" at the outset is typical Phish fare, a meandering workout that breaks out at the five-minute mark and meets a skittering end; here, McConnell's last few notes speak forlornly, seemingly disappointed the rest of his band decided to stop at all. The show must go on at some point, however, and "Anything But Me" follows as a more proper introduction, tailored into an unexceptionally pretty "Billy Breathes" inspired track that pockets just enough grit to hold its own. The true doorway to "Round Room," though, is its third cut, the Gordon helmed title track that pushes the album to take its first real step out of the shadow. A bouncy tune with stuttering interplay and a nonchalant whistle that captures the mood of the album better than this review ever could, it's premeditated and off-the-cuff all at once; in short, a good time.

Gordon's good nature bleeds out and settles comfortably elsewhere as well. "46 Days" is an energetic jaunt that shows even the trickiest improvisations can stand larger on a little form. Anastasio,

Middle Earth: In your home and in your control

If watching "The Two Towers" on the big screen for three and a half hours did not satisfy your Middle-earth cravings, then the video game just might do the trick. EA games has managed to perfect seamless transition between DVD quality video and high resolution video game graphics. The affect of which, leaves players feeling like they are really in the game.

'Lord of the Rings'
Play Station 2
Electronic Arts
EA Studios
RPG

This game is a straight beat-em' up with a few traits of an RPG: you fight your way through a linear storyline, leveling up and improving your characters along the way. Shown from a mixture of a fixed third-person perspective and moving cameras, "The Two Towers" features the core trio of power-players in the fellowship, Aragorn (Strider), Gimli and Legolas as playable characters, while other central figures such as Gandalf and Frodo appear to fight alongside you, but aren't playable. At any time between levels players can switch to any one of the three characters, or if they choose, they can play as one character all the way through to the end.

For those who wait for the lengthy intro demo to finish, the game begins at the battle between Sauron and Isildur, where The War of The Ring ended. Next the game recaps the major battles of the first movie. Only after you have fought off the Dark Riders, a giant water monster and a ton of goblins and orcs do you get to start the actual Two Towers portion of the game.

Kylie's DVD concert sure to leave you with a pop 'Fever'

By NIKOLAS MARKANTONATOS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Kylie Minogue's music is like a chipped cream on the top of a delightful drink: light, fluffy and frothy. Except one thing — you never actually get the drink itself. Don't go looking for much substance on her music because you won't find it. Minogue's music is meant to be fun: to get you up off your seat and shake what your momma gave you.

Kylie Minogue 'Fever 2002' Live in Manchester Capitol Records

The Fever concert (which was also cast live on the web) shot on May 4, 2002 during its wildly successful leg overseas. "Fever 2002 (Live in Manchester)" is a flamboyant futuristic exhibition of 21st century pop. The DVD is perfect for fans who want a summary of Minogue's work while she was absent from the U.S. spotlight but hip in Europe. An excellent picture quality coupled with a fantastic and crisp sound makes for a splendid transition from stage to DVD.

Like many pop concerts, the music takes a backstage to the theatrics. And in true pop fashion, Minogue's show is no different.

The gorgeous petite Aussie emerged from beneath the stage in robot attire. Removing the android costume, Minogue was dressed in a sparkling bikini singing "Come Into My World." The costumes are a big highlight of the show — from a breathtaking ball dress to a relaxed combats/vest combo. Dolce and Gabbana certainly made her look like a million bucks.

To further the futuristic effect, the stage was made up of several monitors and stairs that were complemented by neon green, blue, and red lights that shined on the stage like laser beams. And like many pop concerts recently, Minogue heavily borrowed from Madonna's Drowned World tour (from the gravity defying acrobatics and scantily clad models dropping from the ceiling, the influences were everywhere).

Minogue's great appeal is her bouncy teenage flavor intermingled with an adulthood maturity that serves to satisfy her diverse group of fans. She doesn't have complex choreography or long dance routines — a jiggle of her behind here, a wiggle of her hips there and she's through with choreography. But it all works because much like her songs, they're flavorful but simple. She finds the energy to bounce around like a teenager in "Better The Devil You Know" and is able to kick it down a notch during the ballad "The Crying Game." She even manages to hit a high note during "Confide in Me." She does hit a low note too, though. Dressed in lingerie, Minogue performed a sultry, if not soggy, version of "Locomotion."

It's the new songs, "Light Years," "On A Night Like This," "In Your Eyes," "Love At First Sight," and "Fever" that stand out amongst the rest. But the pinnacle of excitement is met during the last number, as the lyrics to "Can't You Out of My Head" are displayed on the monitors so everyone can join in on one big karaoke signing the la, la, las of the worldwide smash. By the end of the more than 20 songlist, everyone was feeling the fever.

Extra features include the concert projections (25:11), a digital reproduction of the concert program, and a behind-the-scenes documentary (34:07). The interactive menus are animated to represent a computer readout. A six-page insert is included within the DVD keep case.

Aussie Kylie Minogue's stage presence is enough to illicit enough symptoms to send one rushing to the doctor's office.

'Rings' game has flaws, but quality shines

As you reach higher and higher levels with each of the characters, not only are more powerful abilities opened up to you but secret missions and interviews also become available. And once the secondary storyline of the secret missions is complete you can unlock a fourth playable character, though it is up to you to find out who it is.

This game, like all games, has its merits and its flaws. The fellowship characters never switch weapons (Aragorn wields a sword and a bow, Gimli an axe, and Legolas two short daggers and a bow). Another weak point was that this game only encompasses the battles from the movies, leaving it with a slightly choppy feel.

EA obviously noted these weak points and compensated where they could. As the characters grow in experience their weapons are upgraded, growing in power. What's more, their set of attacks increases in complexity. For instance, with a level 5 Aragorn, players can perform a Killing Move (R2), which grows more powerful with added experience and purchases, and looks and performs quite differently than the one in the earlier levels; the animations also change with the new attack. They patched in the storyline between battles by showing Aragorn telling the story to Eowen.

I would give this game a 9.5 out of ten, for its flawless videos, detailed graphics and easy playability. A little bit more attention could have been paid to developing the story but it was mostly all there. A great game all around.

'25th Hour' plotline confuses

the editing led me to believe, and I doubt that was the intention.Brown's work leaves my stomach upset."25th Hour" makes me feel like I should've paid more attention in my film classes in college for two reasons: One, the film stock, or rather, the type of film that the movie is shot on, appears to be unlike most other movies we see. There's more of an emphasis on darker colors, while the brighter ones stand out more obviously. Further, the motions and movements of the on-screen action don't move fluidly, looking closer to the footage from home movies we've all shot on those clunky video cameras from the 1980s. This convention of cinematography is now becoming so overdone and mistreated, that the eye is becoming too acquainted with it. It's not a complete distraction here, but is another way of Lee trying to say "Hey, look at my talent" when he's really not doing anything new or exciting with it. The same can be applied to the film as a whole.

TLC show why it's still the best R&B group

By NIKOLAS MARKANTONATOS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After the tragic death of Lisa "Left Eye" Lopes, the "L" in TLC, one couldn't help but wonder if the trio's next release would be as good as the group's previous work. After all, it was no big secret that Lopes was the creative genius of the bunch. Through infectious beats, undeniable harmonies and in-your-face lyrics the three produced some of the best music of the last decade.

TLC '3D' Arista

Lopes was able to contribute a significant amount on "3D," including collaborating as a writer on four songs. Considering the absence of the woman who served as the glue of the group on the remainder of the album, "3D" is a surprisingly cohesive record. "3D" doesn't take many chances and it isn't the surprise it might have been had Lopes survived. Considering the cool and crazy ones had their hands all over the mix and the crazy one only had a limited impact, it all makes sense.

"3D," TLC's fourth album, is a loving tribute to Lopes by Tionne "T-Boz" Watkins and Rozonda "Chilli" Thomas to their beloved friend and fellow group member. In their true crazy-sexy-cool style, however, the album is not a somber tribute. Instead it's a chic party album that's holds just the right amount of compassion and dance-floor fun. Included on the album are a number of raps by Lopes – one of many elements that helped differentiate the group from their competitors. They're music still possesses the hottest beats around wrapped in their trademark hip-pop funk.

"Dirty," produced by Timbaland and co-written by Missy Elliott, is a club jam that collides all the best elements from three great worlds: Timbaland's slammin' beats, Elliott's funky wordplay, and Watkins' and Thomas' vocals.

The Neptunes got into the action too. "In Your Arms Tonight," a sexy come-on, exudes the silky smooth flow the group's always been able to exude. "So So Dumb," about a man quietly cheating on his wife, is beautiful music with a message – a trademark TLC has always been able to deliver without sounding preachy or contrived. They keep scrubs in check on quality tracks such as "Over Me" and "Hey Hey Hey Hey."

TLC knows how to slow things down too, though. Some of the music on "3D" is so poignant you'll feel like a hand is reaching out of your stereo. Both "Turntable" and "Damaged" are classic TLC cuts. The former, a song about keeping one's head up during tough times, was produced by Rodney Jerkins and features an acoustic melody. The latter is produced by longtime TLC producer Dallas Austin and is about a woman who's insecure with her relationship to a new boyfriend after all she's been through in the past. Acoustic guitars and drums coupled with soulful vocals by the remaining members of the group give the song vulnerability hard to come by in today's music.

While other girl groups continue to ramble on about sisterly love and inseparable chemistry, most fail to make good on their words (the latest high-profile group to lose a member due to disharmony is 3LW). "3D," in its many dimensions, show why TLC is one of the best groups of all time.

COURTESY ARISTA

The Used in bad, smelly condition message; "So here I am, it's in my hands, and I'll savor every moment of it."

But now that I think about it, who cares! The Used turn that cool line into a whiny tantrum that would make you think twice about whether that line was meant to be positive or negative. Or maybe they weren't even thinking that far head.

That would be asking too much.

So back to not showering, let me recall the first time that I have ever seen The Used on MTV, particularly McCracken, the lead singer. I was watching "The Osbournes," and it was the episode where 17-year-old daughter of Ozzy, Kelly Osbourne, announced that she was dating McCracken. Mother Sharon didn't really approve, but she was going to give him a chance and decided to meet him in person.

Sharon's response to McCracken's uncleanliness was much like that of the audience, myself included. Clad in baggy, worn-out clothing that looked like they barely survived a strong wind during the Dust Bowl of the Great Depression, McCracken made an awful first impression to Mrs. Prince of Darkness.

His hair...Oh God, his hair!

The only foreign object that hadn't made it to McCracken's shoulder length, oily, cotton-like, dyed black hair with random streaks of puke yellow and pink, was shampoo. Sharon also made it known that he reeked of "booze and cigarettes." That's probably just the top of the list of things that occupy the stench of Bert McCracken.

Alright, you guys are probably thinking to yourself "Samara, you're so shallow to judge a band by the way they look and smell!"

Well, I agree, but their music is synonymous with their stench. There is nothing really special about the band, and its rock 'n' roll sound is anything but revolutionary, but what can you do? After you hear the group on the radio, the DJ should say "just kidding" afterwards, and make a note that McCracken's cat mating voice is poor due to the lack of fresh air and soap that the poor singer has not had the privilege of being exposed to.

Tarbox Ramblers fire up Iron Horse

By CHRIS FLOUTON-BARNES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NORTHAMPTON — Boston favorites the Tarbox Ramblers made a wee jaunt down the Pike in mid-December for a full night of roosty American music at the Iron Horse.

With a wide grin and his hat cocked askew, band leader Michael Tarbox sat down in front of an array of beat-up amps and guitars and launched into a set of old blues, fired-up gospel and mountain tunes.

Tarbox Ramblers Iron Horse Dec. 14

The Ramblers pushed the pace of their set in the early going with the pulsing drums and narrative vocals of "Stewball," a snappy rework-ing of the old folk song about a legendary racehorse, and gave a fast tempo to the blues standard "Frankie & Johnny."

The Beantown quartet drew most of their material from its eponymous debut release in 2000 on Rounder Records. "Oh Death" featured lively harmonies and Tarbox's slide guitar solo on Fred McDowell's "Shake 'Em on Down" was hypnotic.

The irresistible hook of "Columbus Stockade" delivered upbowed staccato fiddle shadings from Daniel Kellar and Johnny Sciascia's thumping upright bass, and the band showed a masterful command of dynamics on the spell-binding "The Cuckoo," with Kellar's melodic pizzicato weaving through a downbeat vamp.

In marked contrast was the full throttle explosion of the gospel scorcher "Can't No Grave Hold My Body Down." The gospel vein was tapped again to close down the set, with the juhilant refrain of "I'll Fly Away" and Kellar's bluesy solo on "No Night There."

The Ramblers returned for a rowdy encore, with Tarbox uncorking another wicked slide solo. The evening's finale, "Step It Up and Go," was a rousing end to the program. Picture the Mississippi Sheiks in action at CBGB in the seventies to approximate the energy and drive of the Ramblers' interpretations of America's home-grown musical roots.

While renowned for their authentic and spirited sound, the Tarbox Ramblers have primarily carved a niche from a wealth of traditional and public domain material. According to Michael Tarbox, the band's sophomore effort, due this spring, will feature more original compositions. Expect to hear the same vitality and organic spontaneity of the Ramblers' live sound, though; Tarbox counts less than half a dozen rehearsals since assembling the band.

Opening act Mary McBride brought a worldly-wise lyrical sensibility and a talented band with her up from New York City. Effortlessly shifting between lush, loping ballads and head-on rockers, McBride highlighted tunes from her recent album "Everything Seemed Alright." Everything sounded alright, too; there's plenty more to come from this rising talent.

Super Bowl win continutes with parade

By MITCH STACY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

TAMPA, Fla. (AP) – Warren Sapp blew kisses to the crowd, and coach Jon Gruden received the key to the city as an estimated 100,000 people lined the streets of downtown Tampa on Tuesday to celebrate the Buccaneers' Super Bowl victory.

Fans clad in the team's red and pewter colors waved banners and chanted "Defense!" and "Tampa Bay!" as the Buccaneers rode in convertibles and pickup tricks in a parade in their honor.

"This is about you Tampa. I love you," running back Mike Alstott told the crowd.

Tampa Mayor Dick Greco, flanked by mayors from Clearwater and St. Petersburg, presented Gruden the key to the city and said Tampa owed him "a million thanks."

Tampa Bay won its first Super Bowl title Sunday, beating the Oakland Raiders 48-21 in San Diego.

"I was raised in San Diego, but my hometown is Tampa," safety John Lynch said. "I've been here 10 years and I've waited a long time to do this, so help me out – We're No. 1! We're No. 1!"

Sapp added: "Thank you from the bottom of my heart," Sapp said.

Some of the loudest cheers were for defensive coordinator Monte Kiffin, who received permission to speak to the San Francisco 49ers about their vacant head coaching job.

Kiffin is the man responsible for building the Bucs into the NFL's No. 1-ranked defense, which dominated the Raiders.

Fans chanted "Stay, Monte, stay!" as the 62-year old Kiffin made his way to the front of the dais. He made no mention of plans for the future.

"You're the greatest fans in the world," Kiffin said. "We love ya. Let's come back."

Long-suffering Bucs supporters waited 27 years for a championship. The frustration turned into elation Monday as they rushed to stores across the region to buy anything commemorating the Super Bowl triumph.

Many of the fans along the parade route were clothes emblazoned with the Super Bowl XXXVII logo.

On Monday night, a crowd of about 65,000 filled chilly Raymond James Stadium with camera flashes and deafening noise as the Bucs arrived home from San Diego.

"It's our time," Duane Jones, 44, of Tampa, a 20-year fan of the Bucs, said. "It's our season, and go champs!"

for his part, is never caught with his hands on the holster: the man has a lead for all occasions and plenty of supporting flash when words simply won't do.

"Walls of the Cave" falls from the same tree; McConnell's soft and sinister notes build mystery, drummer Jon Fishman taps urgency with cyclical percussion and Anastasio wraps the bundle in a set of warm and familiar vocals, a welcome quality on an album whose foremost weakness is the sometimes paper-thin production. "Fridas" nearly remedies that shortcoming itself when Gordon steals the song away into the chorus and leads an innocent harmony that echoes what its downtrodden lyrics ponder ("I crashed, I burned, but then I learned to keep my eye on you / You always say you'll lead the way, but then you never do.").

Such contemplative moments sprout up all over the album, in bits of pseudo-spirituality and codas of stirring musicianship that combine to promote an appropriately improvisational approach toward life. And when that fails the listener's mood, absurdity abounds. "Mexican Cousin" sports a chorus lead-in that's a scant measure away from the band's "Farmhouse" before turning to a minor progression and reveling in the silliness of it all. ("Oh tequila I turn to you like a lost friend/ I want to kiss my Mexican cousin once again.")

The most obvious influence "Round Room" operates under, however, is perhaps its most daring characteristic as well. Rather than sweeping freely away, Phish returns with a substantial attempt in capturing its inimitable live aesthetic on disc. Like Gordon sings on "Muck Song," "Because it's just a mock song, call it what you will." Anything, that is, but a comeback. This haven't gone anywhere.

Mauldin carries Minutemen

By MATT BRADY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Of all the trends of the Massachusetts hockey team, the most noticeable is certainly the level to which it elevates its play when under adverse conditions. The ability to come back after falling behind has led some to call the team the second coming of the "Cardiac Kids."

UMass	3
N'eastern	2

N'eastern	3

This weekend was no different, as the Minutemen (14-11-1, 8-9-0 Hockey East) jumped to a new energy level when trailing in each of two games against the Northeastern Huskies. Unfortunately for the Maroon and White, after scoring three unanswered goals for a 3-2 triumph Friday, it ran into a hot goaltender on Saturday and fell to NU by an identical score. Greg Mauldin scored points on four of the five UMass goals for the weekend – earning his second KOHO Player of the Week Award from Hockey East.

"I thought we out-chanced them considerably [Saturday]," Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon said. "That's the best we've played. It was just puck luck tonight. If I had one complaint it would be to shoot the puck a little bit better."

Mike Gilhooly, entering the game having made four appearances on the season and posting an .831 save percentage and a 4.71 goals against average, made 31 saves on 33 shots to lead the Huskies (8-14-2, 3-12-1 HE) to a crucial Hockey East victory.

"I really was surprised I got the start," said Gilhooly, who was making his first appearance since mop-up duty against Maine on Jan. 10. "But I've been working hard in practice and Coach (Bruce Crowder) showed a lot of faith in me."

In addition to the normal barrage of UMass shots in the third period (13), Gilhooly had to deal with a late Maroon and White power play, but was able to shake off the pressure for his second win of the year.

"That was pretty hairy," Gilhooly said. "I didn't know how much time was left – I just really [bore] down."

Northeastern got a pair of goals over a span of 3:06 late in the second period to put it up 3-2. Freshman Joe Santilli netted the game-winner for the Huskies, firing a shot past Gabe Winer (18 saves) from the left slot on the power play. Tim Judy and Jason Guerriero assisted on the goal.

UMass Hockey

Three minutes earlier, the Huskies caught the Maroon and White napping at the blueline, and Trevor Reschny made a hard cutback to put the puck short side past Winer for his sixth goal of the season.

The Minutemen got both of their goals in the second frame, with Mike Warner taking a pass from Tim Turner in the zone and bringing the puck to his backhand to put it past Gilhooly. Mauldin was the beneficiary of hard forechecking by linemate Matt Anderson early in the second, getting the puck alone in front of the NU netminder and tucking it behind his opponent.

On Friday, the Minutemen fell behind by two goals for the 10th time this season, trailing 2-0 after one period to the Huskies. But for the sixth time this year, the Maroon and White came back to win after such a deficit to tie the school record for Hockey East conference wins in a season (eight).

Mauldin took the game over after the Minutemen came out flat in the first period, having a hand in all three tallies – scoring one and being the primary assist man on both others.

"Mauldin was great tonight," NU coach Bruce Crowder said. "He figured in all of their goals. He's just a great player."

Jeff Lang scored the game-winner at 10:54 of the third period on a wild play where the puck somehow got through Keni Gibson (27 saves) after what appeared to be multiple deflections.

"There was a bit of traffic to my right," Gibson said. "I got it with my blocker but I guess I didn't steer it far enough away. It was just one of those goals where the guy rushed hard to the net and got it past us."

That capped off the two-goal comeback for the Maroon and White, who got goals from Mauldin – off a pass from Matt Anderson – and Stephen Werner, who punched home a rebound after Gibson stuffed Mauldin on a breakaway attempt.

Northeastern got a pair of first period tallies in the contest, including Mike Ryan's eighth power play goal (16th overall) on a shot from the right slot. Chuck Tomes added his first career goal for the Huskies late in the period on a slapshot that got by Gabe Winer (17 saves).

"I thought we executed things pretty well in the first," Crowder said. "I thought in the third period it could have gone either way. They just threw it on net from the point and got a good bounce. I doubt Don Cahoon Xs and Os that one."

Third-stringer impressing

Massachusetts Minutemen, Gabe Winer," New Hampshire's play-by-play man announced. "The roster has third-string goalie Mike Waidlich as the starter. But I think it's a typo."

A 28-save performance later, and that same play-man was talking about him as a possible starter. It didn't matter that UMass had lost 2-1 in overtime. The freshman was impressive, allowing only a penalty shot goal in regulation to one of the top offensive squads in the country.

As a rookie in front of one of college hockey's more unforgiving crowds, Waidlich was supposed to be the uncomfortable one. But his big frame and positional style was making the Wildcat offense look out of place with the puck.

For 60 minutes he made the outstanding look routine, almost sucking rubber into the UMass logo on his jersey.

He had those guys the media loves to dub "snipers" and "scorers" shaking their heads after scoring chances. This was a kid without a scholarship, forcing blue-chip players to look to the Whitt's ceiling for answers.

"He's big," a reporter remarked in the press box. "Look at him out there. There's nowhere to shoot. I bet we'll see him again."

Good, because Waidlich is tired of watching.

Minutemen find victory in Capital City

He [Reddish] will continue."

The shot that Vig made was huge," Lappas said of the trey that cut GW's lead to one-point. "There's a guy that hasn't made a shot in forever and he knocks down maybe the biggest shot of the game."

Ivy capped off a 6-0 run at 3:41 with a jump hook from the block that gave UMass its first lead of the second half, a lead it wouldn't relinquish.

Anderson and Lasme iced the game, the latter hitting from the free throw line after GW was forced to foul.

Lasme led UMass with a career-high 24 points on 9-16 from the field. Lee chipped in with 15 while Viggiano and Anderson scored 13 and 10, respectively.

Hyman led GW in the session with Lasme hitting the game. They talked about the game's stars for the Abidjan, Ivory Coast native to become more aggressive offensively.

"I told him I wanted him to take some chances," Lappas said. "He wants to please me. He said 'I'm not sure if it's a good shot or a bad shot.' I said 'How about we forget about that today. After the game, we'll watch the tape and decide if it was a good shot or a bad shot, but during the game just go play.'"

"I thought about it. I didn't think I had shot the ball enough," Lasme said. "I'm the two-guard. I have to shoot. Coach told me the two-guard is a scorer. Everyday I'm trying to think of all the good things he told me and go out and do it on the court."

George Washington boasts a great, young rebounding squad led by freshman big men Hall (8.7 rebounds per game), Pop Mensah-Bonsu (5.1 rpg) and Omar Williams (4.6 rpg). Even with Brand and Rogers playing the entire game, UMass probably still would have been beaten on the boards, but without them, they gave up 24 offensive rebounds.

The Minutemen made up for the lack of inside strength with a solid, and uncharacteristic, 49 percent shooting performance from the field (27-for-55).

Lee led the Maroon and White with nine rebounds, while Lasme grabbed five off the defensive glass.

Lappas, whose team had struggled against beatable opponents in the A-10 schedule, also earned career-victory No. 250. But the former Villanova and Manhattan coach was just pleased to get his team conference win No. 1.

"I'm very happy for them," Lappas said of his players. "They were so happy in the locker room you'd think we were going to the NCAA Tournament, which we are not obviously, at least not until the Atlantic 10 Tournament. But this was good for our guys, good for everybody."

Amateur league toughens players

For Anderson, juniors was a path to take following high school, but for some, like Greg Mauldin, it is an alternative. Mauldin played at Div. III Holliston High School, where he felt he would be overlooked by scouts. He opted to play for the Boston Junior Bruins, where he was named team MVP in both his seasons with the squad.

"It's a lot more games and practices," Mauldin said. "I played 60 games my first year, 60 my next year, over 120 practices. We have offseason training starting in March or April, so it's a long season. You get a lot more ice time I think. You get to travel a lot more, you get to see kids from around New England. Age-wise you play against older kids. Everyone seems to want it a little bit more."

But while junior hockey provides a more physical brand of hockey than prep school, that does not necessarily mean that incoming freshman are on par physically with college athletes.

"The talented guys [in high school] always got by whether they were in shape or not," Anderson said. "When you get to junior hockey, some got by on talent and some got by on being in good shape. At the college level, you have to have both. Everyone thinks they're in shape when they get here. Then they realize how tough the schedule is and that they really aren't."

Arguably the toughest transition that student-athletes have to make when moving from junior hockey to the college level is in the classroom. Those who go to juniors after high school face the task of getting back in the mindset of being in the classroom after an extended absence. For those who played while attending high school, they need to balance two separate lives – one in the classroom and one at the rink.

"When I first got here it was really tough," Anderson said. "Plus, I had been out of high school for two years, so it was kind of a tough adjustment to get up at 7:30, go to classes, go to the rink, and sometimes not get back until seven at night."

"In juniors, they really don't follow up on school as much and you're just kind of going to school and going to practice every day," Mauldin said. "There really isn't any consequence if you don't do your work. In college, you're taking tougher classes, obviously, and it's more of a challenge, I think, than it is in high school or juniors. They care – it can get you off the team, whereas you do it for yourself in juniors."

The life outside of junior hockey is also a mixed bag. With such a wide range of ages and situations being represented in the circuit, it is often tough to find a common thread among lifestyles.

"There's a lot of down time," Anderson said. "Some guys don't go to school, so you really have almost the whole day if you're not working, not going to school. It's hard to keep busy sometimes, you get really relaxed and developed some bad habits."

But for Mauldin, who practiced 25 minutes away from his hometown, a social life was all but nonexistent.

"When I played juniors I was still going to high school so I didn't really have much time to hang out with my friends from high school. I really didn't have much of a social life except for my teammates and high school."

For nearly all players in juniors, life away from the rink tends to be of higher quality while attending an institution of higher learning, even though the faces are often the same.

"In college," Mauldin said, "you're with your teammates all the time, in the dorms, you go to classes with them, practice...those are your really good friends and like your brothers almost you're with them so much."

Tough place to play

Dayton 10-0 at home; Receiving AP votes

By JIM PIGNATIELLO
Collegian Staff

It's been a running joke down in the Campus Center Basement for a few years now.

"Tough place to play."

Former Massachusetts men's basketball coach James "Bruiser" Flint used to say it quite a bit, and it stuck. Seasons later, and the Collegian-ites are still using it. Some weren't even at UMass during his era.

Usually it is tied with something ridiculous. For instance, "Springfield Civic Center, tough place to play" may have been uttered after the Minutemen (7-11, 1-5 Atlantic 10) lost to a less-than-spectacular Lafayette squad there earlier in the season.

No joking around this time, though.

Tonight, the Maroon and White truly will be in one of the toughest places to play in the A-10.

UD Arena – home of the Dayton Flyers, who are receiving votes in both the Associated Press and ESPN/USA Today polls. Many visiting teams have gone into UD Arena, the site for this year's A-10 Tournament – looking for a win this year. None have come out with one.

In fact, 10 teams have tried, and failed, against Dayton (13-3, 5-0 A-10) at home.

The Flyers, just 3-3 on the road, have beaten some big dogs at home, in front of between 11 and 12 thousand fans for each and every game. The place was packed and rocking for wins over then No. 21 Cincinnati and then No. 13 Marquette.

It isn't just the fans that have made Dayton a legitimate threat to make the NCAA Tournament this year. The players are pretty good, too.

The Flyers are led by a lethal frontcourt duo of Brooks Hall and Keith Waleskowski. A pair that goes together like thunder and lightning. Hall and Waleskowski dominate their opponents from the inside out.

At 6-foot-6, Hall can play either of the wing positions. A preseason A-10 third team selection, Hall is likely to start at small forward tomorrow night against the Minutemen. No. 33 leads the team at 13.7 points per game while grabbing 7.8 rebounds.

Waleskowski, meanwhile, can play either power forward or center. At 6-foot-9, he will likely start out at the four against UMass. Waleskowski, a preseason conference third-teamer, averages 13.1 points and 8.1 rebounds per game. His matchup with Maroon and White senior Jackie Rogers should be a dandy.

At 11.7 ppg, guard Ramod Marshall is the third Flyer averaging double-digits.

For the fifth straight game, UMass coach Steve Lappas will start three rookies, one second-year player and a senior – Rogers.

Lappas' four young starters are coming off their most impressive game to date. Mike Lasme, Gabe Lee, Jeff Viggiano and Anthony Anderson combined for 52 points in UMass' 75-70 win at George Washington Saturday afternoon. It ranked as the team's first A-10 win of the season.

Rogers is the only player averaging more than 10 points per game this season (13.4), but Anderson is real close at 9.9 and Viggiano and Lasme are pushing double-digits in games they have started.

Lasme led the way with 24 points on 9-for-16 shooting, while Lee grabbed nine rebounds and scored 13 points.

Lee, whose presence inside will be important for UMass tonight, thinks that his game has finally turned a corner.

"I'm playing to my abilities now. I know I'm a player," Lee said after Saturday's game. "That's what I came to UMass to do. It's the second half of the year. I'm not a freshman no more. I'm just ready to play ball."

UMass earns first A-10 win

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON – Two years from now, Saturday's win at George Washington may be remembered fondly as the day things finally came together for Massachusetts men's basketball coach Steve Lappas.

UMass	75
G.W.	70

Anthony Anderson, Mike Lasme, Jeff Viggiano and Gabe Lee were forced to take over Saturday's game and, in the end, led UMass (7-11, 1-5 Atlantic 10) to its first conference win of the season.

With leading scorer Jackie Rogers forced to the bench for most of the game with foul trouble – he eventually fouled out after scoring just five points in 20 minutes of action – and fellow captain Micah Brand out with an injury (ankle), the young quartet was forced to carry the load. The foursome, of which only Anthony Anderson has a full year of college experience, totaled 52 points in UMass' 75-70 victory over the Colonials (6-10, 0-5 A-10).

GW senior Chris Monroe banked in his 2000th career point, then drilled a jumper and lobbed a nifty alley-oop to Mike Hall. The quick run put the Colonials up 65-58 with nine minutes to go.

But UMass stepped up down the stretch, outscoring George Washington 12-5 the rest of the way.

After a Monroe turnover led to a Lee jam and Lasme made the front end of a 1-and-1, Viggiano came off a screen at five minutes, 35 seconds and hit his first 3-pointer of the A-10 schedule.

"It had been a long time since I got one," said Viggiano, who entered the game 0-for-18 for three in A-10 games. "My confidence was down, but it felt good coming out of my hand.

Minutewomen drop two; lose Nelson

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

DAYTON, Ohio – The Massachusetts women's basketball team is happy to be home, after a road trip through Ohio produced two losses in the standings and one big loss on the court.

The Minutewomen (11-7, 3-4 Atlantic 10) saw sophomore point guard Katie Nelson, who has been intrinsic to the success of the offense all season, go down with a knee injury just 10 minutes in Sunday's 68-60 loss to the Dayton Flyers.

Nelson's injury capped off an already dismal weekend for UMass. The Minutewomen lost both contests after being even at halftime. On Sunday, the trifecta of juniors Stefanie Miller (19 points), Cyndi Stull (13) and senior Chrissy Donovan (13) proved to be too much for the Maroon and White.

Things were looking bright for the Minutewomen early, as they jumped out to a 12-2 run in the first four minutes. But Dayton responded, and took the lead at the end of the half.

Coming out of the break down 34-32, the Minutewomen struggled from the field, and went to the foul line just once for the entire game, as part of a three-point play by Nekole Smith.

Coach Marnie Dacko was visibly upset with the officials, after numerous instances of fouls being given to the wrong Minutewoman, as well as the scarcity of Dayton fouls. Things came to a head when junior Cleo Foster was called for traveling after being sent sprawling by a Dayton player.

"That play really determined the outcome of the game," Dacko said. "It really took the wind out of our sail."

Senior Nekole Smith was one of the few bright spots throughout the night, chipping 17 points and six rebounds in the losing effort.

The first game featured a clash between two teams which, had they not been wearing different colors, could have been the same squad.

With the Minutewomen led by Marnie Dacko, and Xavier helmed by Kevin McGuff – an assistant on the 2001 National Champion Notre Dame Fighting Irish for six years – both teams came into the Cintas Center with identical overall and conference records (11-5, 3-2 A-10), and both sat in second place in their respective divisions – the Musketeers in the A-10 West, UMass in the East.

To continue the comparison, both squads boasted Atlantic 10 Players of the Week, with Jennifer Butler leading UMass, and Amy Waugh captaining the Musketeers. Xavier also brought the Rookie of the Week in Tara Boothe, enjoying her third rookie award this year.

Throughout the first half, neither team escaped the similarities. The lead switched just twice, with the Minutewomen ahead most of the way. Pogues splashed a 3-pointer with 7:42 left in the half to give the Maroon and White its biggest lead at 29-22. The Musketeers clawed back, though, and used big shots from Reeta Piipari and Waugh to bring the game to 33-all at the break.

In the second half, Piipari was the star, scoring 17 points and playing every minute of the frame.

The Musketeers used Piipari's stellar night, and key points from Boothe and junior Aida Sarajlija to pull away, leading by as many as 11 points midway through the half.

"It's disappointing that you stop Waugh, and then Piipari steps up," Dacko said. "I thought at Xavier we played very well, well enough to beat them, but we had the drought in the second half."

When Smith and Butler got into foul trouble, the game was all but over, and after Butler received a technical foul for slamming the ball down in front of referee Terri Maddock, Xavier coasted to the victory.

While Piipari has been making waves all season, it was expected that Waugh would be the headliner. While UMass's Cleo Foster put in a tremendous effort guarding the elusive five-and-a-half-footer, Waugh still managed a quiet 18 points.

Walk-on Waidlich tired of watching

Matthew F. Sacco

Mike Waidlich wore a look of frustration.

As he sat in the lobby of the Mullins Center practice rink, with ice pressed against a newly opened wound on his neck and his goaltending equipment strewn about, all he could do was stare at the floor.

Occasionally he'd lift his vision to the hockey practice before him. He'd gaze past his sweaty black bangs, through the puck stained glass and his face would reveal dissatisfaction.

As a third-string goalie, Waidlich has gotten his fill of watching. But this is practice, his time to play. His chance to show coach Don Cahoon that his freshman inch frame is agile enough to compete on some hockey's best conference.

But right now a slapshot has him sitting out, holding his wrench long cut on his collarbone.

That's until the team's medical trainer gives him the nod. And like a child grabbing scarf and mittens to break winter's first snow, Waidlich is pulling on his pads as he rushes toward the rink door.

"Be careful out there," the trainer says.

"Yeah, it's not like I'm ever going to play," Waidlich retorts sarcastically.

Twenty-four hours later, the evening before the Minutemen travel to Durham for a game against UNH's rank at New Hampshire, Cahoon told Waidlich a freshman walk-on he'd be getting his first career start.

Many players would wince of going into the Lawrence Whittemore Center for their collegiate debut.

With a sold-out setting and a whiteout of 6,500 fans jawing Waidlich a myriad of compliments like "you suck" and "screw" things can get hairy for a green goaltender.

But Waidlich didn't blink. This was his chance, he vowed to make good of it, he needed to make good.

The local scars from Millers Falls has worked hard for the chance. When practice started in the fall, he was little more than a shooting dummy.

But early bird agilities drills with goaltending guru Jim Stewart and a work ethic not typical of a third-stringer without a scholarship has pushed Cahoon's goaltending decisions to hair-pulling status.

In December, he showed himself so well in practice that Cahoon played one goalie a period against No. 13 Ohio State in the Everblades College Classic.

Waidlich drew the second stanza, and save for his gaffe in leaving the short side post open for R.J. Umberger he played well.

Still, nobody expected Cahoon to throw him into the fire of the Whitt. And after he showed up in the starting goalie slot on the line chart, there were doubters.

Juniors build skills with amateur competition

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

This is part two of a four-part series exploring the different paths taken to college hockey.

Stephen Werner is breaking out of the defensive zone for Massachusetts. The former U.S. National Development Program prospect under pressure, finds Greg Mauldin through the neutral zone, who one-touches the pass to Matt Anderson and into the offensive zone. It's easy to see the three plays with maturity far superior to what would be expected of two freshmen and a sophomore.

"The junior programs typically, the kids are there a little bit longer, so you can take a kid out of juniors that has a couple more years experience, and is at a different maturity level, so sometimes you go into juniors looking for different dimensions," Massachusetts coach Don Cahoon said.

Many aspiring college hockey players these days are turning toward junior hockey – where long seasons, travel and fighting are elements of the culture.

"It's a lot more competitive," said forward Matt Anderson, who played two seasons for the New England Junior Coyotes. "There are no weak guys, there are a lot of older guys, and everybody wants the puck. It's really competitive and feisty, fighting is a big part of junior hockey, toughness is a big part of junior hockey."

Anderson, who came into the UMass camp at 5-foot-11, 195 pounds, was far smaller when competing in high school in West Islip, N.Y. But juniors provided him with an opportunity to fully mature into his body before moving on to the college ranks.

"I matured really late, my senior year of high school I was only 5-foot-8, 150 pounds," he said. "I was probably ready to go play prep school, but it wasn't really available to me. My best bet was to take an extra year at home and then go play juniors."

High school student receives life sentence

By Adam Gorlick
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) – Corey Ramos killed the man everyone called "brother" – a man whose family, friends and students went to for advice, comfort and guidance.

After a jury convicted Ramos of second-degree murder yesterday, the people who loved the Rev. Theodore Brown – a high school guidance counselor and Pentecostal minister who died from a stab wound that punctured his heart – said they're trying to follow the preacher's example and forgive his killer.

"I can imagine Ted looking down at us here today with a desire to see us all showing love and compassion for Mr. Corey Ramos," church deacon Leslie Lewis told Superior Court Judge Thomas Curley Jr. "Not looking down with an intense hatred to see Mr. Ramos punished, but with justice."

Punishment came with justice. Ramos received a mandatory sentence of life in prison with the possibility of parole in 15 years.

Ramos, 18, stabbed Brown eight times with a double-edged knife during a classroom fight that erupted after Brown repeatedly told the student to follow school rules by removing his sweatshirt hood.

"Corey Ramos is looking at spending the rest of his life in jail," said Brown's daughter, Tashia Brown. "And for what? A hood. Is it worth it?"

Ramos was also found guilty of possession of a dangerous weapon and carrying a dangerous weapon.

Ramos stood silently with his hands clasped behind his back as the verdicts were read. Later, he rocked back and forth in his chair as Brown's friends and family members told Curley what the minister's loss has meant to them.

"On Dec. 5, 2001, when Ted left the house, I was a wife. By the end of the day, a widow," Joyce Brown wrote in a statement read by Brown's brother, Brent Brown Sr. "The word I did not ever think I would become. My lifestyle has changed because of this crime; now I go to therapy just to learn how to face each day without Ted."

Ramos' attorney, Alan Black, said his client had post-traumatic shock disorder caused by beatings he received and witnessed as a child. Black had planned to call a psychologist to the stand to testify that Ramos was suffering from the condition when he stabbed Brown.

But Black decided against calling the witness after Curley said he could not guarantee the jury would be prohibited from hearing about Ramos' prior record if the psychologist testified about her diagnosis and how the disorder may have affected Ramos' behavior.

"Corey was the subject of abuse at a very early age," Black said. "He watched as his mother – day in, day out – was abused and then he himself was abused and beaten. It's no wonder the events of December 2001 occurred as they did."

Black argued Brown provoked the fight by hounding Ramos to remove his hood and putting his hand on the teenager's shoulder, something Ramos told him not to do.

But Sarah McMullen, a teacher who saw the fight in her classroom, testified that Ramos hit Brown first.

Students also testified that they watched the two brawl, but never saw the knife with a 4-inch blade and brass-knuckle hilt that Ramos used to stab Brown.

"This was a dangerous, violent person," prosecutor Brett Vottero said.

Hampden District Attorney William Bennett said Springfield High School, the alternative school for troubled students where the stabbing occurred, could have been better protected if officials knew about Ramos' violent past.

He called on lawmakers to approve legislation that would allow police and prosecutors to tell school officials about students' criminal histories.

"Things could have been different here," Bennett said. "The school had no information on Corey Ramos' background."

SGA back in session

New positions filled as second semester begins

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Possible budget cuts, a vetoed Student Government Association Senate motion by President Dave Carr and new appointees to the Executive Cabinet began the first Senate meeting of the new year.

Members of the SGA Senate convened last night after a month-long winter break, bringing forth ideas for changes in the coming year. Issues surrounding Governor Mitt Romney's possible budget cuts were discussed, with senators and members of the SGA Executive Cabinet expressing their concerns.

Members stressed the need to be in touch with what is happening at the state level so that the University of Massachusetts student body can be protected from any potential cuts.

"Budget cuts for next year are starting right now as mid-February comes and I hope that we can have some sort of recommendation if cuts need to be made here," Senate Speaker Dan Saunders said. "We need to start talking now. We also need to be looking at Title IX and what the state of Massachusetts is doing with affirmative action because this will effect our campus and the terms in which we make our own policies."

SGA President David Carr vetoed a motion to revise the Campus Activities Policies and Procedures handbook.

Saunders said that if cuts come, it is the SGA's job to make sure that they affect students in the least possible manner.

"I've done a lot of worrying over budget stuff, and basically if budget cuts occur, we need to make sure that they won't impact students' lives in any significant way," Saunders said.

The first motion to be brought forth by the Senate was a reinstatement of a motion passed by the Senate in November, stating that the Campus Activities Policies and Procedures handbook should be changed to state that events planned must be turned in prior to the event with a recommended deadline of six weeks early.

President David Carr vetoed the motion, sparking disagreement from members.

Carr explained his reasons for the veto, saying that the motion was illegal when it was passed in November and is ineligible to be brought forth to the administration. If the motion were to pass, it would give Campus Activities as few as 48 hours to plan some events.

"The state says that you have to have a certain amount of time and 48 hours does not cut it when planning events," Carr said. "When Campus Activities found out about the motion they freaked out. Basically it's impossible to do this motion, straight out."

Carr said that the motion goes against state law and that the SGA did not realize that when they passed the motion in the fall.

The Senate tabled the motion until further research could be done. It will appear on next week's agenda.

The Senate approved Hannah Fatemi, former Executive Cabinet Secretary of University Policy, to the position of Attorney General last night as well as Senator Brian Long to the Executive Cabinet position of Secretary of University Policy. Former Attorney General Courtnes Horrocks resigned, as she will be studying abroad this semester.

Members of the Senate concluded their first meeting by approving two elections commissioners from the commuter area, Lynn DiTaranto and Tracey Popko. Currently there are six active elections commissioners within the SGA.

Carr and Saunders said that last semester was a learning process and that this semester is when the Senate will show what it wants to accomplish for the student body.

"The Senate has the power and they are representatives for this entire student body," Carr said. "It's all about information and the more you know the more capable they are to make changes so hopefully they'll get out their and do that."

Saunders agreed, stating that his goal for the Senate is to get more in touch with the UMass student body.

"The SGA has an opportunity and the power to change things on this campus and this power is activated when we have the student body behind us," Saunders said. "We have elections coming up, so we have a lot of important issues to discuss."

The Senate will meet next Wednesday, Feb 5, at 7 p.m. in room 174 of the Campus Center. All Senate meetings are open to the public.

Senate Speaker Dan Saunders and Associate Speaker Matthew Pelnar take a moment to discuss issues on the night's agenda. Saunders was especially vocal in the meeting, stating that it is the duty of the SGA to minimize the effects of projected budgets on the student body.

Hussein offered safe haven

British Prime Minister Tony Blair speaks yesterday during Prime Minister's Questions at the House of Commons in London. Blair leaves for Washington today for talks with President Bush that will center on the situation in Iraq.

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – The United States would try to help find a haven for Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, his family and close aides if he would agree to leave Baghdad, Secretary of State Colin Powell said yesterday.

"That would be one way to try to avoid war," Powell said at a news conference as President Bush, talking tough on Iraq, rejected calls from war opponents to let inspectors deal with Saddam.

Just containing the Iraqi leader could leave that country free to join with terrorists to attack America "and never leave a fingerprint behind," Bush said in Grand Rapids, Mich.

"In my judgment you don't contain Saddam Hussein," Bush said in a speech that focused on his domestic policy agenda. "You don't hope that therapy will somehow change his evil mind."

Powell endorsed exile for Saddam but said it would not be up to the United States alone to determine whether the Iraqi leader should be granted immunity from prosecution as a war criminal.

"If he were to leave the country, and take some of his family members with him, and others in the leading elite that have been responsible for so much trouble during the course of his regime, we would, I'm sure, try to find a place for them to go," Powell said at the State Department.

"That certainly would be one way to avoid war, and we have indicated that before," he said.

Later, the State Department spokesman, Richard Boucher, described exile as "an idea floating out there" but not one getting serious consideration.

Bush may dedicate a speech to Iraq sometime after Powell produces the U.S. evidence to "close the loop" on the case the president began to make in the State of the Union address, a senior administration official said.

Another official said two more speeches could be in the offing, one to explain the deadline and another to announce why war is necessary, if he decides that it is. Both officials stressed that no decisions have been made on any future speeches, though considerable thought is being given to them.

Such talk is part of an effort to increase pressure on Saddam with a series of steps, starting with the address and perhaps including another U.N. deadline, another U.N. resolution and another presidential speech. The administration is weighing whether to set a deadline for Iraq's disarmament.

Powell and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld discussed the possibility of Saddam going into exile during briefings on Capitol Hill, said House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas.

DeLay said that "if it's done under the right conditions, I would say they see that as an option. There are still possibilities out there to avoid going to war."

As the administration weighed whether to set a deadline for Saddam's disarmament and prepared to make public next week details about Iraq's weapons programs, Bush called Saddam "a danger not only to the countries in the region."

"Because of al-Qaida connections, because of his history, he's a danger to the American people, and we've got to deal with him before it is too late," the president said.

Bush added that "we must address threats today" before it is too late.

"What's changed for America, besides the fact he's still dangerous (is) there's now a shadowy terror network which he could use as a forward army, attacking his worst enemy and never leaving a fingerprint behind," he said.

Iraq's deputy prime minister, Tariq Aziz, on Wednesday denied Bush's allegations about a connection with al

Chancellor to award seniors with medals

By Courtney Charles
Collegian Staff

Outstanding seniors will now be able to receive an adaptation of the prestigious Chancellor's medal starting at this year's Commencement ceremony. It is considered the highest honor bestowed on individuals at the University of Massachusetts.

"The idea is that we have some fabulous students on this campus who contribute to the University's well-being in many different and comprehensive ways," Charlena Seymour, interim Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs and provost said to the Campus Chronicle.

"We want to recognize their accomplishments and nurture a relationship with them for the future's sake," she said. "We want them to look back and remember that the University really valued them."

Chancellor John V. Lombardi is calling for the student nominations from the faculty, according to the Provost's Office.

"He wanted to take the opportunity of Commencement to recognize a group of outstanding students who are both talented academically and also have contributed to the University with exceptional performances in other areas," said interim Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo-Anne Vanin to the Campus Chronicle. "It's our hope that faculty from across the University will take this opportunity to nominate their students who stand above the rest."

Qualifications for the award include a strong academic record and additional achievements.

A variety of contributions to the campus community will be considered for the award, according to the Campus Chronicle. They include demonstrating strong leadership qualities that unite and inspire others towards positive action and expanding the intellectual climate of their academic area through noteworthy and original research, noticeably improving the quality of Qaida, saying "I challenge Bush and his government to produce any evidence of that." He was interviewed on ABC's "Good Morning America."

In releasing the memos it says it has about Saddam's weapons programs, the administration hopes to convince skeptics at home and abroad that Baghdad is defying United Nations demands.

Secretary of State Colin Powell, who will brief the United Nations next week, said that "I expect to put forward information and evidence which will fill in some of the gaps with respect to what Dr. Blix and Dr. ElBaradei discussed early this week about the problems they've had getting Saddam Hussein to participate in the disarmament.

"The information I present, some of it will be an expansion of information that has already been seen. Some of it is information that has been given to inspectors and some of it will be new information that was simply not relevant to the inspectors work but relevant to illustrate the case with respect to the Hussein regime's possession of weapons of mass destruction," he told reporters Wednesday.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said the administration is "now entering the final phase" and only a narrow "diplomatic window" remains open.

Bush has meetings this week with prime ministers Silvio Berlusconi of Italy and Tony Blair of Britain, the closest U.S. ally. One option being considered is to set a final deadline for Saddam to comply with U.N. disarmament resolutions.

Powell and Rumsfeld told House members at a closed-door briefing that the administration was reviewing intelligence to determine what could be released without compromising intelligence sources or methods. The task is complicated by the fact that a photograph that is meaningful to intelligence officers may appear to an untrained observer as simply a bunch of rooftops, a senior official said.

"Some have said we must not act until the threat is imminent," Bush said. "Trusting in the sanity and restraint of Saddam Hussein is not a strategy, and it is not an option."

Carolina plant explosion kills at least three people

By Estes Thompson
Associated Press

KINSTON, N.C. (AP) — An explosion followed by a raging fire demolished a plastics factory Wednesday, killing at least three people and injuring at least 37.

The cause of the thunderous blast that sent a black, acrid smoke billowing over the countryside was not immediately known. The West Pharmaceutical Services plant made syringe plungers and IV supplies, and had been cited for numerous safety violations last fall.

Three bodies had been found amid the twisted debris by late Wednesday, according to Chief Deral Raynor of the North Lenoir Fire Department, the scene commander.

Raynor said he believed everyone at the plant at the time of the explosion had been accounted for, but a safety department official on the scene cautioned it was too early to say.

Workers who escaped the fireball and the choking smoke said they thought the factory was under terrorist attack. Sampson Heath said the explosion sent a plume of fire toward his work station and knocked him off his feet.

When he stood up, he saw wires and tiles hanging from the ceiling and could hear trapped co-workers screaming for help.

"Your life did flash before your eyes," Heath said as he stood in the yard of a church, getting hugs and kisses from relatives.

The first emergency crews on the scene said they repeatedly rescued workers who were dangling from steel beams. Many had third-degree burns.

The Red Cross said at least 37 people were injured, some critically. At least 11 of them had been treated and released by Wednesday night, according to information from hospitals compiled by the Red Cross.

The blast was felt for miles, with the smoke punctuated by exploding fireballs. Nine hours later, the building was still burning.

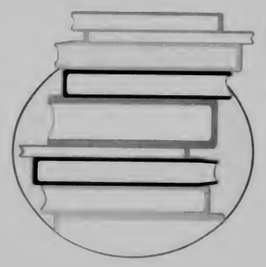
"The damage is catastrophic to the building," said Greg Smith, operations chief of the Kinston Public Safety Department. "The structure is so compromised that you just can't enter and walk around."

Emergency officials urged residents within a mile of the plant to evacuate because of the smoke, which included fumes from burning plastic. Hugh Pollock, headmaster of nearby Arendell Parrott Academy, said windows in his building burst from their frames and one child was cut on the head by broken glass. The private school was evacuated.

"It was quite an explosion. It lasted for several seconds," he said. "It almost felt like an earthquake was taking place."

Fellowship secured by professor

For the second year running, the AT&T Foundation has bestowed a $25,000 Industrial Faculty Fellowship on University of Massachusetts Professor Anna Nagurney.



Nagurney, the John F. Smith Memorial Professor of Operations Management at the Isenberg School of Management, will use the money to continue her project, "Supernetworks and the Environment: Foundations and a Virtual Center."

Last year, Nagurney's project involved her and a half a dozen students formally studying a variety of networks, including e-commerce supply chains, transportation, telecommuting, teleshopping and regional economics.

"Last year's initial AT&T fellowship was mostly about the foundation's expectations; this year it's just as much an endorsement of our work," Nagurney said. "They've seen it, approved it, and want us to continue."

A child's peace

An unidentified child stands on Route 9 and holds a sign that proclaims "Peace not War" during a demonstration in downtown Northampton yesterday. The rally was held in response to President George Bush's policies on Iraq. Approximately 75 people were present to sing songs, hold posters and wave at cars.

Hussein says Iraq ready for U.S.

By Charles J. Hanley
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Saddam Hussein, in remarks televised yesterday, said Iraq "has huge capabilities" and is ready to face a U.S. attack, "destroy it and defeat it." A senior Baghdad official condemned President Bush's State of the Union speech, saying it was filled with "cheap lies."

"When faced with an attack, we always put in our calculation the worst case scenario and we build our tactics on that," Saddam told military commanders. "We know that they are coming with large forces of infantry and armored units to storm our defensive positions. But we will absorb the momentum of the attack, destroy it and defeat it."

Saddam said the Americans have no right to attack Iraq "and every one of them, from the top down to the smallest soldier, is coming as an aggressor with ambitions."

"We will have long successive defense lines with continued support of equipment," Saddam said. "Iraq is not Afghanistan. Iraq has huge capabilities and throughout history, Iraqis never allowed foreigners to stay on their homeland."

As the crisis with the United States escalates, Iraqi television has been frequently broadcasting scenes of Saddam conferring with military commanders and senior lieutenants. It was unclear when the meeting aired Wednesday took place.

The broadcasts appear aimed at rallying the Iraqi population at a time of crisis and sending out the message that Saddam remains in firm control of the military and civilian leadership.

On Wednesday, a top Iraqi official took issue with Bush's address to Congress.

"Banned weapons are not small objects that Iraq can hide," Maj. Gen. Hussam Mohammed Amin, head liaison to U.N. arms inspectors, said on Iraqi television. "Iraq has gotten rid of all these weapons."

Iraqi leaders also rejected Bush's allegation of past or potential links between Baghdad and the Sept. 11 terrorists. "There's no connection between al-Qaida and Iraq," said lawmaker Hazem Bajilan, a foreign affairs specialist in the National Assembly.

Ordinary Iraqis, meanwhile, voiced growing fears of a new U.S. war, a conflict one doctor saw as a "catastrophe" in the making for civilians.

International arms inspection teams pressed on with their unannounced rounds Wednesday, dropping in on an Iraqi missile-fuel plant, an ammunition depot and other sites, as their chiefs prepared to meet behind closed doors with the U.N. Security Council in New York.

Those chiefs, Hans Blix and Mohamed El Baradei, reported to the council Monday that Iraq was cooperating on practical matters in the 2-month-old inspection process, but was not offering evidence to allay suspicions it retains chemical or biological weapons missed by previous U.N. inspectors in the 1990s.

Iraqi officials said they would submit their own rebuttal to the United Nations by Thursday, "clarifying" points raised by the chief inspectors.

Under U.N. resolutions dating to Iraq's defeat in the 1991 Gulf War, the Baghdad government is forbidden to pursue nuclear or other programs to make weapons of mass destruction. If inspections certify Baghdad's full compliance, the Security Council will consider lifting 12-year-old international economic sanctions on Iraq.

The U.S. and British governments contend Iraq has hidden programs, and they threaten a military invasion if, in their view, it doesn't comply and disarm. But most other governments, including those of close allies, are reluctant to grant U.N. authorization for such an attack.

In his State of the Union speech, Bush asserted that such Iraqi weapons would be a threat to America, and "sometimes peace must be defended" – through war.

The U.S. president's address was not available to ordinary Baghdadis through television or radio, but such threats are familiar to Iraqis.

"Under sanctions, even now, the health situation for Iraqi children is bad," Dr. Ahmed Abdul Fattar told a reporter at a Baghdad children's hospital on Wednesday. "You can imagine if a war breaks out. This would be a health catastrophe."

War worries are weighing on all Iraqis, said Hussein Fadel, a high school physics teacher. "All people here are tired of thinking – they're thinking all the time whether Iraq is going to face attack or not," he said in English.

In his speech, Bush referred to biological agent anthrax, the nerve agent VX and other weapon types, and said, "The dictator of Iraq" – Saddam – "is not disarming."

The U.N. inspectors of the 1990s certified the destruction of thousands of munitions containing such agents, but open questions remain about some, because of discrepancies and gaps in Iraqi accounts of arsenals and numbers destroyed.

The Bush administration has said for months it has "solid" evidence such weapons remain hidden in Iraq, but it has yet to produce anything concrete. Secretary of State Colin Powell is scheduled to appear before the Security Council on Feb. 5 to present what is billed as new such intelligence information.

The Iraqi deputy prime minister, Tariq Aziz, was dismissive. "The accusations of Mr. Bush in his statement last night are baseless, simply baseless," Aziz said in an ABC interview.

"Now people are more unconvinced about the Bush allegations than any time before."

Amin, a general, said on Iraqi TV that Bush's speech was full of "cheap lies with a political purpose." He went on, "We deeply regret that Little Bush" – an epithet frequently used here for the second President Bush – "is relying on lies. He knows that Iraq has respected all resolutions."

Chief nuclear inspector El Baradei, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said Tuesday his experts have yet to receive any "actionable" intelligence from the Americans.

In fact, in his State of the Union address, Bush revived an old allegation that El Baradei's IAEA concluded was wrong – that aluminum tubes Iraq sought to import were meant for equipment to enrich uranium for nuclear bombs.

"They're not looking for the truth," another senior Iraqi, presidential adviser Amer Rashid, said of the Bush administration. "What they're looking for is to distort the truth."

Media responsibility is key to public trust

[illegible] company [illegible] story rather than anything rooted in fact, the courts at least have denied the company further ground until it can furnish something that supports its claims.

Protecting the rights and health of a child is a commendable and necessary detail – if, of course, the child in question actually exists. If in fact it does, they're denying it natural rights, and tallying it around as a commodity rather than responding to it as a human life. If it does not, which all evidence points to, they're playing the media for their own gain only, obscuring its focus even further in a time when it needs to be – from the corporate giants on down to the smallest of independent presses – as focused and attentive to the truth as it ever has been. The fantastic and questionable have long sold beliefs and captured imaginations, a fine thing in the context of entertainment. When the media attaches itself to such stories – particularly in this wired age where information not only spreads more rapidly, but misinformation is as readily accepted as truth – then it's a danger to those willing to believe. And, in the long run, when future events of legitimate importance are reported, stories like this will sap the authority with which they are written.

Until proven as truth, the belief can only be assumed as false. The media should realize they carry that weight as well.

So why wasn't he admitted? Upon further examination, he was also a part of a small number of students who actually got an interview with the UC Davis medical school. Roughly one sixth, or 520 out of 3,109 applicants got an interview. Bakke didn't do well in the interview process and the admissions committee found that Bakke had a limited approach to medical problems and had "very definite opinions which were based more on his personal viewpoints than upon a study of the total problem." According to the lawsuit, Bakke also applied to the school in 1973 and didn't make the waiting list that year or in 1974. Race wasn't necessarily a factor here. With the racial quota, Bakke's average likelihood of rejection increased from 96.8 percent to 97.3 percent, a difference of 0.5.

There are other factors that weigh into admissions in the same point system category that race does. For example, geography (where you're from), athletes and alumni preferences are also used, and those are rarely debated. Gender also plays a role. In some schools, in programs such as nursing, men are given a few extra points on their applications than women. Aside from being an athlete, these are things that are accidental. You cannot choose to be born male or female, to be the kid of an alumna, or where you grew up just as much as you can't decide to be born a certain race. And no one is leading a crusade against these factors.

> "...you'll find that, excluding race, they still would have been lost in the applications pile."

Jennifer Gratz was a victim of these factors. Gratz was not a star athlete and grew up in a Detroit suburb (had she been from another part of Michigan she would've been given a few more points). Her parents were also working class people with high school degrees and were not University of Michigan alumni. This last factor is not uncommon and should be an issue just as big as race. Social diversity is often neglected, and there are many poor white applicants who are also disadvantaged in the admissions process because they don't have access to a quality high school education or the money to attend college.

Affirmative action is a temporary remedy for the greater issues that face people of color in this country. Sadly, it's been a 30-year remedy but one that is still necessary. When public schools in poor neighborhoods, such as inner cities and rural areas, have enough money for smaller classes and more supplies, and when our country has a balanced amount of all minorities in all social classes, then affirmative action in higher education can go. I will stand up and be one of the first people to push for its elimination when that day comes. Today is not that day.

Producing confidence in Russia in 2003

Mark Ostroff

Cranes and wrecking balls have become familiar sights throughout Russia's larger cities. On the outskirts of Moscow, one can look back into the city and see a field of cement foundations of what will soon be offices for Russia's businessmen and homes for "Russia's new middle class."

The decaying, ugly flats of the old days are being replaced with red brick, "European standard" towers with twice the insulation and a quarter of the maintenance that the old "khrushchyovki" used to offer. Russia is developing at a proud pace and even brought in the New Year with a $4.84 billion budget surplus.

The new year of 2003, however, is going to be long year for Vladimir Putin and his administration.

Since the Yeltsin era, Russia has been struggling with its free market reforms at the expense of its elderly, disabled and under-educated populations.

The overnight reforms left a generation of Russians completely helpless in adjusting to their own standard of living, rather than submitting to a government-issued one.

In the game of free market economics, the country at least has the basics. Russia has the land area, which is rich in natural resources. And it especially has decent leadership, which steered clear of the economic crisis of 1998, proving that Russia has the drive.

Nevertheless, in 2003 Russia will have to ask even more questions:

"Have we got diversity in our economy?"

"Is the world buying our goods?"

And most definitely, "Is Russia a good investment for not only other countries, but for Russians as well..."

This question seems to be one of the country's bigger economic shortcomings.

Every year, billions of dollars in cash and gifts are spent "greasing the machine" of Russian bureaucracy. Russia's Federal Security Service (FSB) is still full of high and low ranking loose cannons, while police-citizen relations have come to resemble "Boyz in the Hood."

Months after Russia's hostage crisis, Muscovites sadly remember the incident as another sloppy and bumbling example of Russia's undisciplined security forces.

> "And it especially has decent leadership, which steered clear of the economic crisis of 1998, proving that Russia has the drive."

Moscow businesses flooded the Kremlin with reports of litigation threats, claiming to have been looted and vandalized by the FSB, who had set up headquarters adjacent to the siege. One tenant, an owner of a gay bar in the same building, returned to his club to discover thousands of dollars in damage and the words "wretched faggots" on the wall of his newly renovated bar.

So, where is all the initiative for entrepreneurs, small business owners or even foreign entities if even the local police can't control themselves?

As Russia welcomes the year 2003 and as Putin gets ready for a hopeful re-election, many people seem to hope for Putin's agenda to include reform in the country's security on the local and national level. In my opinion, this will most likely (or at least, should) be Putin's piece de resistance.

The example that is offered by these litigations is basically the red flag for the veteran KGB operative to sharply reform the FSB from being called "the mafia," as Russian college students have angrily referred to it as. Higher standards for the nation's federal and municipal security are important for, not only civil security, but also economic security. There is potential success for Russia's business sector in creating a tame, volunteer security force, with high priorities for civil rights and civil justice instead of disgruntled underpaid draftees. Laws would be enforced and property would be well protected, so even your average middle-class investor could sleep at night.

Even while the country undergoes sharp and central security reforms, procurement and research and development money would make a full investment into a more diverse economy for Russia. Like America during the Cold War, Russia will also have the opportunity to diversify its civilian economy with products that will be developed under military contracts of newly privatized corporations, and sold to commercial sectors (think back to where the Internet, cell-phones and PCs came from).

Russia should be proud of a successful recovery and a budget surplus from 2002, but while President Bush tries to instill "consumer confidence" in the American people, it is still up to President Putin to try to instill "producer confidence" in the Russian people.

This can only be done once Moscow builds a better system of accountability in which somebody will answer for the lingering police, military or bureaucratic faux pas of the Soviet era.

When people feel less worried about their property and money, there will be fewer reservations in believing that Russia means business. If not, then in the words of one Russian bank official, "rather than catching up with Portugal, Russia will be keeping company with Venezuela and Nigeria..."

You can't go backwards, only forward

Erin Wallace

Being home over winter break gave me a lot to think about. I am not looking forward to going to class in the bitter cold, getting stressed out about papers and exams and having to endure daily piles of homework. However, I am very excited to see my friends who I haven't seen or talked to all break, save for AOL Instant Messenger. I've kept myself busy by immersing myself in the news – everything from the potential war on Iraq to the struggling Celtics and Bruins. And did anyone else see the footage of our President, Billy Bulger, collapsing at the funeral of Will McDonough at St. Augustine's Church in Southie? Perhaps he saw his brother hiding in the rafters? Hey, anything can happen.

Last year, I definitely did not dread coming back to school. I still had that freshman bug-eyed look – I was completely wrapped up in the college environment and the very idea of being so independent. When I came home, it was like I was handcuffed – suddenly, I had curfews, I couldn't come and go as I pleased and of course, I didn't have any of my friends from school. I was climbing the walls, eager to hang out with my friends again and to continue doing as minimal work as possible while taking gen-eds like Theater 100 and Music Theory for Beginners (both, by the way, are easy A's). Now in my second year, I'm still very happy at UMass, but for some reason I'm enjoying being home more than ever. I've never appreciated free home-cooked food so much, or just the simple company of my family, who I am very close to. I love seeing the new faces of home friends, and going to my church at home again. It's a comfort level thing that I've learned to appreciate, especially over the last few weeks.

During one of my lazy days this past break, I found some old baby pictures in my room. As I looked at the pictures, I started to reminisce and found myself longing for much simpler days. One picture I found was of me at about six months old. My dad is standing in the kitchen, holding me in one hand and a raw turkey in the other. In the background I spotted some pots hanging on the wall with shiny copper bottoms. They're the same ones my family still cooks with. Back then, they were brand new and my dad would always wash them carefully and polish the bottoms after each use. Since then, the pots have grown less unpolished, less shiny and there are even a few burned spots on the bottom. It got me to thinking, and I devised an analogy.

Like the pots I spotted in the picture, I'm less polished than I was as a kid. I've grown older and there are more blemishes on me, from all the mistakes I've made and stupid things I've done. I'm not so shiny, and am more vulnerable than I once was. I don't have my parents with me all the time to guide and help me through my decisions, and they obviously can't baby me like they used to. Times aren't so simple like they once seemed to me. Do you remember when your biggest problem was what mom packed you for lunch at school? Or what you got on your spelling test? I wish I could return to that state sometimes – when I was a brand new shiny pot, waiting to experience the world. But then, like the pots on the wall in the picture, I got washed, dried, burned and used as I got older, and times became less simple. Sometimes I wish I could escape the suite dramas, the mounds of work, the stress that goes along with being an active college student, and turn back the clock about 14 years when my world consisted of Sesame Street, Mister Rogers, Reading Rainbow and 321 Contact.

These are silly thoughts, I realize. No one can turn back the clock. People don't get younger. People get older and pots don't get shinier, they get dirtier and rustier. And no matter how much I dreaded it, I'm back at UMass. So the best I can do is wish for a good, fun and productive semester, and I do hope that you keep your "pots," as dirty as they may be, with just the tiniest bit of shine.

Diego Rivera and Frida Kahlo in 1929

By S.J. PORT
Collegian Staff

Carried through the streets of her native Mexico City by one of the many transit passenger cars, Frida Kahlo sat beside her first love, Alexander Gomez. Having completed their classes for the day, the two were headed to their homes in Coyoacan, a borough of Mexico City. As the bus swerved through the streets, Kahlo watched her beloved city. She hung onto a railing, and in a moment she was flung forward, the bus thrown kilter when a car in the street veered onto its side. A side railing impaled the young Kahlo, entering through her right side and leaving her body through her vagina, fracturing her pelvis, breaking her spinal column, collarbone, several ribs and fracturing her right leg in 11 separate places. Additionally, her right foot was crushed and dislocated. She was 18 at the time and studying medicine at the National Preparatory School – a passion found after defeating the childhood polio that had left her left leg weak and thin.

In the months following the accident on Sept. 17, 1925, Kahlo was encased in a full body cast and bonlike frame of pulley structures to adjust her for changings, forcing her to remain still and flat on her back. Unable to leave her home, let alone her bed, she miraculously regained the ability to walk and care for herself a year later. However, the accident left Kahlo in pain for the rest of her short life. She would later discover, after several agonizing miscarriages, that the accident had also cost her the ability to bear children. Instead, she acted as an aunt and second mother to both her sister's children and those of her later husband, muralist Diego Riviera.

Born to a German Jewish father and Catholic Mexican mother in the borough of Coyoacan on July 6, 1907, Kahlo was unusual in her look as well as academics and art interests. A unibrow that would become a defining characteristic of her signature look arched across her otherwise pretty face, spreading above her high rounded cheekbones. Her dark hair was cropped until the accident, after which she allowed it to grow into long braids, and often wore trousers and men's suits, much to the chagrin of her mother.

Kahlo excelled in school, so much that she found the time to organize pranks with a group of her male peers while remaining a top-notch student and infuriating many of her professors and those working at the national institution – including then-already-famous, communist provocateur and muralist, Diego Riviera. Later, after several years of surgery, binding castes and corsets to keep her spinal column from further crumbling (she spent vast amounts of time alone in bed with only her paintbrush to explore her pain), Kahlo would approach Riviera as a woman and an artist in search of his professional opinion of her work.

Guillermo Kahlo acquired the house in which Frida and her sister Christina would grow up in 1904. The blue-walled home, on a corner of two prominent streets, became known to locals as the "Blue House." It was there Guillermo made his living as a photographer in the dark room he built. It was there Frida learned to paint, for when Guillermo's black and white pictures were finished, he would have Frida color the photographs, often adding small traditional Mexican scenes – including prayers called exvotos. Later Frida would say her paintings were not surreal. Instead, she claimed they represented what she saw with the pain she felt and the dreams she dreamt painted within, over and among the real images.

"I paint my own reality," Kahlo once said. "The only thing I know is that I paint because I need to, and I paint whatever passes through my head without any other consideration."

Kahlo embraced the gift of painting taught by her father and used it throughout her remaining years to cope with the two major accidents in her life: "I suffered two grave accidents in my life. One in which a streetcar knocked me down...The other accident is Diego," Kahlo said later of her marriage to the great supporter of her political and artistic life, Diego Riviera.

Upon regaining the strength to walk, Kahlo once again ventured to Mexico City, for the first time riding again on a streetcar similar to the one that had crippled her. Returning to the downtown city and her former school, Kahlo sought the advice of her country's most admired artist, also a notorious womanizer. Rivera was working on one of the many murals he painted on the campus walls, commissioned by the school to encourage political thought in its students when a petite (just above five feet tall) woman called up to him to come down and speak with her.

Diego remembered Kahlo from her days as a troublemaker at the school and came down his ladders to her level, asking how he could assist. Kahlo requested his opinion on her portfolio of paintings and required a true critique, so she could

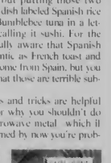
Easy cooking with aid of book on microwave magic



Everyone remembers those warm, homemade dishes served at family functions and holiday events- they were comforting, they were familiar and even if you eat them now you're reminded of home. Well, those days are over bonbon cake, and unless you've managed to sneak a fully equipped kitchen in your footlocker, your chances of creating replications of this food are slim.

Micrology

Jessica Pelletier

Fortunately enough, professor Karen Dwyer of the University of Nebraska has compiled a veritable encyclopedia on microwave recipes and performance information for those deprived of an expansive cooking area. Currently, professor Dwyer is a teacher of public, speaking with a degree in home economics (no, I didn't think it was an actual major either) and communications. Another publishing venture by Dwyer was the semi-similar "Easy Livin' Microwave Cooking for the Holidays," a perennial favorite for those who can't drag themselves away from the nuke box even for those few days when oven baked treats are an almost government mandated necessity. Here's a little tip for the person who purchased this piece of literature - just go out and buy Oreos for your shindig, no one will think any less of you if the name is scratched off of them.

With what would seem to be a rather limiting cooking device, Dwyer shares over 200 recipes combined with tips, secrets and some rather out-of-context inspirational quotations. Example- "Cheerfulness and contentment are great beautifiers, and are famous preservers of youthful looks." Cute, of course, but I expect this saying embroidered on a pillow by a sweet grandmother, not adjacent to a recipe for fudgy brownies. Nevertheless, the recipes are reputable and far from the ordinary. Here's an abridged sample recipe for Chicken Divan:

1. Place 1 lb. boneless, skinless chicken breasts in a 2 qt. Casserole with 1tbsp. butter, one-quarter cup water and sprinkle with paprika.

2. Cover and microwave for 12 minutes on high. Drain and save cooking juices. (Which, yes, seems a little odd and certainly questionable, but the professor has spoken.)

3. Add a half cup frozen broccoli, 10 3/4 can cream of mushroom soup, 1 1/2 cups instant rice and 1 cup chicken broth

4. Microwave on high 10 minutes and let stand for five minutes.

Not a bad meal for an appliance usually reserved for warming pop tarts and Cup o Noodles. Unfortunately, some of the directions fall a little short of their intentions. Case in point: the Spanish rice contains a jar of spaghetti sauce and American cheese. I most certainly do not doubt that Ms. Dwyer is an accomplished cook, but putting those two ingredients in a dish labeled Spanish rice is like rolling Bumblebee tuna in a lettuce leaf and calling it sushi. For the record, I am fully aware that Spanish rice is as authentic as French toast and that it did not come from Spain, but you have to admit that those are terrible substitutions.

Dwyer's tips and tricks are helpful explanations for why you shouldn't do things like microwave metal - which if you haven't learned by now you're probably going to end up on Rescue 911 some time soon. She also speaks of the importance of eliminating the use of soft plastics in your cooking. Again odd, due to the general fact that by the second decade of an adult lifespan one tends to remember that certain containers pose a tendency to melt. People requiring instructions such as these are most likely the ones who honestly read and follow the proper instructions for heating the aforementioned pop-tarts.

In the end, the cookbook does a good job of clearly informing the readers how to create their own meals while at the same time explaining the technical information behind the recipes. No word yet on whether the professor intends on producing further books, but this first work proves to be a useful encyclopedia on the subject of microwave cookery.

Dylan "Rolls" on with latest live disc "Thunder" awakens tracks from 70s

By SCOTT ELDRIDGE II
Collegian Staff

It takes a lot to put out a live album 27 years after the fact; it takes Bob Dylan to do it right. With "Live 1975" Dylan repaints the room once more.

It may be in the versatility of the lyrics or in the way he seemingly never plays a song the same way twice, but as an artist Dylan has adapted his songs to any era, any music styling. And 1975 was no different.

Over one quarter of a century after Dylan's Rolling Thunder Revue took Northeastern venues by storm, Dylan has come out with "Live 1975."

This is an album that encapsulates every sound and aura that Dylan's tours in the mid-seventies possessed.

Bob Dylan
'The Rolling Thunder Revue'
Columbia

The album is the fifth "bootleg" officially released by Dylan. The first three were incorporated in "The Bootleg Album Volumes 1-3." This was followed by "The Royal Albert Hall Concert, Live 1966," a performance at London's Manchester Hall where set one is acoustic and two is electric, to the vocal dismay of many in attendance. "Live 1975" continues this tradition of showing the redefined Dylan.

Zimmerman attracted much attention with the politics and theatrics behind the Revue tour. This was the time when "The Hurricane" hit the airwaves in defense of Rubin Carter. It was also an era for Dylan that included whiteface, elaborate hats, crazy feathers and performances that went beyond music and defined characteristics of a generation.

Joan Baez joins Dylan in this part gypsy, part poetry, part theatre tour, in a collaboration once touched upon but never fully developed. At one point she responds to an audience member asking about their once romantic relationship. "Don't make myths. A couple? A couple of what?" she shoots back to the inquiring mind. Baez's vocal prowess comes out on four of the tracks further bolstering the lyrical strength of Dylan's songs.

The thunderous "Isis" is typical of the "Rolling Thunder Revue." "Isis," a twisted love story put to music, brings out the strength of the band backing the solo voice. This song, along with "Tonight I'll be Staying Here with You," and "It Ain't Me, Babe," supports the avante garde mentality behind the "Revue."

Dylan's lyrics are oft regarded as some of the most flexible and form fitting of any musician. As Stevie Wonder once remarked before playing "Blowin' in the Wind," the lyrics, unfortunately, will always be relevant. Teamed with Baez on this track, the political and social message stands clear.

The songs on this album range from radio favorites such as "Just Like a Woman," to the obscure including "One more Cup of Coffee (Valley Below)."

Any fan hanging onto the obscure favorites loosens their hold when "Tangled up in Blue" comes off the album. This well-known song saw ample radio play, but is recreated in fine form on this two-disc set. Dylan flew solo and unplugged on this one and the wanderer's tale takes on a personal feel.

"Knockin' on Heaven's Door" takes on that same personality. With Roger McGuinn – who took on Dylan's work while leading The Byrds – electrifying the performance, an indelible mark is made. Scarlet Rivera's fluid violin sounds course over the guitar to create an ethereal sound fitting the grave anthem.

With the exception of four tracks, the album was created with concert tapes recorded in Worcester and Boston. Along with the two-disc set there is a DVD featuring "Isis" and "Tangled up in Blue." The visual display offers a glimpse of what it was like to see Dylan in the 70s.

Watching and listening to the whitefaced, scarved and barefoot Dylan proves that he cannot be placed in any time period or associated with any particular style. A rolling stone gathers no moss, and he just never stopped rolling.

Bob Dylan returns with a fifth live album that does everything but disappoint. "The Rolling Thunder Revue" contains tracks recorded 27 years ago.

'Justified' is just that for N'sync frontman Timberlake is solid in solo debut

By NIKOLAS MARKANTONATOS
Collegian Staff

Two years ago critics were sharpening their pencils, all writing off teen pop stars. Cynics proclaimed every teen pop star would fall from the pop culture stratosphere and into oblivion. But the joke's on them; for many teen idols, the opposite has actually happened.

The canyon separating teen pop and adulthood is long and deep. Fall into it and you could go the way of Debbie Gibson and Tiffany. Land safely and you could experience continued multi-platinum status (for now at least). Britney Spears barely made it. Nick Carter (heartthrob of the forgotten Backstreet Boys) was barely able to get halfway over the gap before plunging like a stone. But Spears' ex and Nick Carter's ultimate foe has flown right above the divide, landing safely onto fertile land.

Justin Timberlake
'Justified'
Jive

After years of being labeled the "frontman" of the mega-successful boy band 'N Sync, it was only a matter of time before Justin Timberlake launched a solo album.

"Justified" was produced with the help of crafty wizard Timbaland and the ubiquitous Neptunes and draws heavy inspiration from Michael Jackson's work. Jackson may be a one-man circus nowadays, but his influence is everlasting. The self-proclaimed King of Pop has influenced many artists today – either through sound, dance or both. In the album's artwork, every pose Timberlake strikes is Jackson-inspired. And considering how good Jackson was it's quite all right for artists to aspire to be like him. But just a few more individualistic qualities would have been nice on "Justified." While Timberlake borrows heavily from Jackson's many talents, he never reaches his greatness.

Nearly every track on the album centers on Timberlake's break-up with Spears. Half the songs are about the abrupt severing of a romance and the singer's rather hard-hearted stance. He makes it clear he was the wronged party, especially on the harsh "Last Night." "Are ya happy girl?/ (Huh?)/ Knowing that you right near broke my heart into a piece or two." And he's not willing to forgive her, either: "Saying you're young and confused/ Well that's a lame excuse." His venting apparently rid him of any guilt, hence the title "Justified."

He also seems to enjoy boasting about the swinging single life, with many of the songs here almost gratuitously lascivious. On the hopping "Right for Me," Timberlake coos, "I could think of a couple positions for you." The Timbaland produced "Cry Me A River" is a staccato driven number where the beats and bass are heavy enough to make this a show-stopping number. But "(And She Said) Take Me Now," featuring purring from Janet Jackson (who has been romantically linked to the 'N Syncer), is standard R&B fare: a mid-tempo number accompanied by a whirling beat.

The Neptunes also offer up a good amount of pop confections from the soft sway of "Take It From Here" to the future dance-floor scorcher "Rock Your Body." "Nothin' Else," is a slinky love song that has subtle beeps imbedded in the tender track.

The album isn't completely free from shmaltz. The drippy Brian McKnight-produced ballad "Never Again" would have been better left off. The cheesy Latin kick-off track, "Senorita," isn't the appropriate attention-grabber that it should be.

In the end, "Justified" comes off as a firm debut solo effort. Again, Timberlake fails to reach the same type of Jackson-era excitement. Jackson was and remains a better singer, dancer and overall entertainer.

Justin Timberlake cements himself on the pop circuit with his debut solo release 'Justified.'

'Idol' and 'Millionaire' shine for Fox network

By DAVID BAUDER
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – Fox rode the very large wave of "American Idol" to its biggest ratings week in years.

The network, which had been having a tough season until January, had its largest weekly audience in five years for prime-time programming that did not include a major sporting event, Nielsen Media Research said Tuesday.

"American Idol" drew 26.5 million viewers for the first night of its second season last Tuesday, and just under 25 million for the second episode Wednesday.

Fox's other reality sensation, "Joe Millionaire," was also in the top 10.

The success is likely to continue: "Joe Millionaire" this Monday was seen by 20.3 million, that series' largest audience yet. It was 18.8 million last week.

The ratings accomplishment was overshadowed somewhat by the Super Bowl, which enabled ABC to win the week's ratings race. The game, viewed by an average of 88.6 million people, gave ABC an average of 22.5 million viewers for the week (11.7 rating, 18 share).

Fox averaged 12.2 million viewers (7.1 rating, 11 share), CBS had 10.7 million (7.2, 11), NBC had 10 million (6.6, 10), the WB had 4 million (2.5, 4), UPN had 3.4 million (2.1, 3) and Pax TV had 1.1 million (0.8, 1). Fox's rating was lower than CBS', even though it had more viewers, because more people were watching CBS programs while alone.

NBC's "Nightly News" won the evening news ratings race, averaging 11.5 million viewers (8.3 rating, 15 share). ABC's "World News Tonight" was second, averaging 10.9 million viewers (7.5, 14) and the "CBS Evening News" had 9.6 million (6.9, 12).

A ratings point represents 1,067,000 households, or 1 percent of the nation's estimated 106.7 million TV homes. The share is the percentage of in-use televisions tuned to a given show.

For the week of Jan. 20-26, the top 10 shows, their networks and ratings: Super Bowl XXXVII, ABC, 40.7; "Super Bowl Post Game, Part 1," ABC, 33.1; "Super Bowl Post Game, Part 2," ABC, 23.4; "CSI: Crime Scene Investigation," CBS, 15.2; "American Idol-Tuesday," Fox, 14.3; "American Idol-Wednesday," Fox, 13.8; "American Idol" special, Fox, 13.1; "Joe Millionaire," Fox, 11.5; "Law & Order," NBC, 11.1; "Friends," NBC, 11.0; "Law & Order: SVU," NBC, 11.0.

Examining the life of legendary artist Frida Kahlo either pursue painting to help her family pay her crushing medical bills or find another job. Rivera told her she should leave the painting she liked best; if it interested him, he said he would come to her home to see the rest the next day.

The next day, Rivera appeared on the steps of Kahlo's Blue House, inspired and drawn to her work. He would become her greatest supporter, a rabid defender of her work and a powerful political comrade. Rivera and Kahlo married on Aug. 21, 1929, again to the disappointment of Kahlo's mother, who questioned Rivera's two previous divorces, adulterous reputation and radical politics as well as his fat and ugly appearance. However, he had money and paid off the Kahlo family's remaining debts and mortgages, appeasing their qualms.

Upon marrying, Kahlo moved into the apartment above Rivera's studio where he lived and hosted many of their notorious, politically charged gatherings. Diego had been to the Soviet Union, traveled in Europe and the States and nourished Kahlo's burgeoning interest in communism by introducing her to the radicals of their time and country.

Kahlo had little success at this point as an artist in her own right. She traveled with Rivera across the United States, through major cities and exhibitions in Los Angeles, Detroit and New York. As he worked for the likes of the Rockefellers, Kahlo painted in the couple's small hotel rooms, waiting at home while Rivera seduced his many models and the American women who flocked to him.

In 1934, after only five years of marriage, Kahlo became fed up with Rivera and his unapologetic adultery when she found him in bed with her beloved baby sister Christina. She divorced him and moved home to her parents' Blue House where her father had remained following her mother's death.

Kahlo left Mexico in 1936 to live in New York alone for a year. She then traveled to Europe where she was wined and dined by Pablo Picasso and the expatriates of Hemingway's world. The Blue House of her childhood remained in her dreams and on her mind as she traveled, evidenced by her 1936 painting, entitled "My Grandparents, my Parents and I" or "Genealogical Arbol," which today hangs in the Blue House now a museum of Kahlo's life and art.

Throughout her travels, Kahlo wrote long letters to Rivera. Their bond as friends, artists and comrades tied them together despite their divorce. Upon return Kahlo and Rivera were asked to harbor a fugitive Leon Trotsky and his wife Natalia when Stalin exiled them. The Trotskys left Norway on Jan. 9, 1937 for Tampico, Mexico where Kahlo and comrades met the couple and brought them enveloped in a police escort to the Blue House.

Within the boarded windows, behind police guards and in Frida's amorous arms, Trotsky wrote his article "Its moral and ours" as well as other communist propaganda pamphlets that were distributed among their friends and across the countryside. Trotsky stayed at Kahlo's house, while the divorced Rivera remained in his apartment down the road from 1937 to 1938, leaving only to go into hiding once from Mexican Stalinists threatening the home – blue walls and Trotsky's life.

When Natalia Trotsky realized her husband's affair, he knew it was time to leave, as Diego would soon also discover it – and Diego did not permit his ex-wife to have male lovers, only females were acceptable. Rumor runs that Diego threatened Trotsky's life with a shotgun, but more realistically, Diego's own changing politics threatened Trotsky, and their feuds drove the Trotskys from the Blue House to their own apartment at the other end of town. A few months later in 1940, Trotsky was assassinated with a hatchet.

Following Trotsky's departure Rivera came back to Kahlo, and the two decided to remarry on Dec. 8, 1940. A year later they moved back to the Blue House, which Kahlo inherited upon her father's passing. But Kahlo was not well during this ill fated days, as her spinal column had begun to crumble severely. Her leg was amputated below the right knee in 1953 after turning gangrene. However, Kahlo maintained a teaching position at the School of Painting and Sculpture; her students simply came to her for lessons instead of her teaching at the school.

That year, Kahlo met a life long dream of having her own exhibition. It was the only solo exhibition she had during her life in Mexico, and her doctors told her she was too sick to attend. Under no condition was she to leave her bed, their ruling mandated. Yet Kahlo found a loophole; she brought the bed with her. She was carried into her exhibition in the very bed in which she spent so many years in caste painting the pictures hanging on the gallery walls. The motorcycle and ambulance escort suited the dramatic presenter, and she wowed her gathered audience as she was placed in the center of the exhibition, appropriately turning herself into part of the show.

A year later, mourners gathered at Kahlo's cremation ceremony to pay their final respects to the comrade, artist, lover and woman that Frida Kahlo had become to them all respectively. As if her communist, bisexual, revolutionary, surrealist life were not shocking enough, the artist gave her fans a final, frightening goodbye. As admirers filled the room to watch her body enter the crematorium (as was the common practice at the time in Mexico), the sudden blast of heat from the opened doors blew her small frame upright to a seated position. Her hair blazed as it burned standing on end from tip to scalp; the fire encircled her head like a halo, reports stated. Some even claim Kahlo's lips appeared to break into a seductive grin as the doors shut and her final goodbye was said. The final words in her diary, written on the day she died, July 13, 1954, read, "I hope the leaving is joyful, and I hope never to return."

A woman artist, Kahlo has inspired cult-like followings across the Americas and in Europe. One web site even boasts "Kahloism" as a newfound religion idolizing Kahlo as well as Rivera. If the results of a Google search represent a person's popularity in our times, Kahlo may easily be considered an icon. Painting only for herself, she once said, "I leave you my portrait so that you will have my presence all the days and nights that I am away from you."

Her body of work is vast and consists of paintings and drawings, in the traditional sense and on her casts and corsets, in museums around the world. In the spring of 2002, an early self-portrait of Kahlo sold for over five million dollars at Sotheby's in New York, setting a new world record for Latin American art and a female artist. The recent revival of Kahlo frenzy may in part be due to Salma Hayek's production and portrayal of the artist in a film released this past October. However, they are several earlier documentaries that have helped to fuel the fire along the way. Kahlo's diary was also recently re-released in color with translations and comments by Carlos Fuentes and Sarah M. Lowe. Perhaps the best, and most complete, biography of Kahlo remains the 1963 book by Hayden Herrera, "A Biography of Frida Kahlo."

Just like the Blue House, the home Kahlo shared with Rivera in the trendy district of San Angel in Mexico City has since been turned into a museum displaying and celebrating both artists and their life together. Gale Randall of the Mexico Connect wrote that Frida embodies and relates to so many people that this is where her magic draws from: "Frida speaks to many people – the physically handicapped, indigenous peoples, Chicanos, feminists, leftists," he stated.

However perhaps it is more the way in which she grasped hold of life with two strong fists and held onto her own wild ride that developed in us a respect and admiration for her as a human, able to express that ride through her art, that gives Frida Kahlo the power she holds for so many.

Robbins incoherent on eve of Super Bowl

By JANIE MCCAULEY
Associated Press

ALAMEDA, Calif. (AP) – Barret Robbins was incoherent and didn't know where he was the night before the Super Bowl, Oakland Raiders coach Bill Callahan said Wednesday in his first public comments about the troubled All-Pro center.

Robbins, who has a history of depression, spent Super Bowl Sunday in a San Diego hospital after disappearing from the team's hotel the night before. Callahan would not reveal Robbins' current whereabouts.

The 6-foot-3, 320-pound lineman reportedly had stopped taking his medicine for depression. He missed a team meeting, a position meeting and a walk-through practice Saturday, Callahan said.

"I was fearful something wrong was occurring," said Callahan, who decided to bench Robbins on Saturday night, then later chose to send him home.

The Raiders lost to the Tampa Bay Buccaneers 48-21.

Robbins could not make flight arrangements from San Diego to Oakland because his wallet and identification were missing, Callahan said.

A man who says he was among a group that drank with Robbins on the day before the Super Bowl told the San Francisco Chronicle that heavy drinking left the Raiders' center despondent and suicidal.

"He was crying and totally depressed about his life and the pressure he was under," said Cartier Dise, who owns a vehicle customizing business that has provided rims and wheels for the vehicles of Raiders players.

"This guy was messed up. All he could think about was his family, his two daughters," Dise told the newspaper. "He was talking about killing himself, saying he was disappointing people and he had a lot of people to support financially and he was letting them all down."

Dise did not immediately return calls Wednesday.

"There's a point in time you can only do so much as a coach and as an organization," Callahan said. "His situation didn't mandate personal bodyguards around the clock."

When asked if Robbins is still a Raider, Callahan said, "absolutely" and said there's a "viable" chance he will play for the team.

Rose still hitting casinos

By JIM LITKE
Associated Press

Commissioner Bud Selig must have been thrilled to pick up the newspaper recently and find out that Pete Rose is still hitting.

The casinos, sports books and racetrack, that is.

Rose continues to live the way he played – with reckless abandon, just about everything Pete has picked up since he put down his bat has turned out to be trouble. Last week's revelations that the Internal Revenue Service has slapped a lien on a home he owns in suburban Los Angeles suggests that nothing has changed.

It turns out Rose owes $151,689 in federal taxes from 1998. It's the kind of thing that can happen to anybody, except that Rose served a five-month prison sentence a decade ago for filing false income tax returns. He admitted not reporting $534,968 in income from autograph appearances, memorabilia sales and gambling from 1984 to 1987. And those who have read Kahlo's diary was also recently re-released in color with translations and comments by Carlos Fuentes and Sarah M. Lowe. Perhaps the best, and most complete, biography of Kahlo remains the 1963 book by Hayden Herrera, "A Biographs of Frida Kahlo."

One Cincinnati paper reported that Rose was seen gambling at the Bellagio casino in Las Vegas and hanging around the sports book at nearby Caesars Palace.

Two high-ranking officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, told The Associated Press last week that baseball's security department began investigating Rose earlier this month. But both stories apparently caught the commissioner by surprise. What was particularly stunning was the timing – both of them coming when Rose's chances for reinstatement were better than at any time since the late Bart Giamatti, then the commissioner, banished Rose from baseball in August 1989.

The latest effort began with secret negotiations late in 2001, went public last month, amid signs that Selig was softening, and had a chance to gain some serious momentum when Selig announced plans to convene the living members of the Hall of Fame at a meeting in Los Angeles and take a poll on how they would feel about Rose joining their ranks. The timetable was for a decision by the commissioner before spring training.

Now, as Rose himself might say, all bets are off.

Passing Pete off as rehabilitated was impossible even before this latest round of setbacks. Giamatti said that Rose would have to "reconfigure" his life before he would be reconsidered for reinstatement, and while there's nothing to suggest he's done anything illegal, recent events have made clear that the only reconfiguring Rose is doing at the moment is calculating the changing odds on a tote board.

In the past, Rose has shrugged off his paid appearances in Sin City by claiming he doesn't play casino games, and other than the ponies, that he no longer even bets on sports.

He's also said that the only reason he's taken up so many questionable outside employment opportunities – as a greeter, shill and spokesman – is because he's banned from making a living inside baseball. Funny how that never kept him away from the same places during his playing career.

In any case, if Selig and his inner circle are fast becoming convinced of anything, it's that Rose isn't likely to change. Like Tonya Harding, another disgraced flimflam artist, he's decided to play the victim and keep asking for do-overs until the end of time. The difference between the two – so far – is that Harding didn't show up on the Home Shopping Network selling souvenirs the same night she got thrown out of her sport.

That memory alone should serve to keep the commissioner from considering any request for reinstatement anytime soon. A member of Selig's inner circle told the New York Daily News that "he's not going to make this decision and end up being embarrassed by it."

The Hall of Fame has so far managed to keep Rose out. His response was to set up shop down the street and hawk his own merchandise during induction ceremonies. If baseball decides to let him in through the front door, it would only be a matter of time before the furniture would start turning up for sale on eBay.

person can't replace Katie and what she does for the team."

Monique Govan will likely be tabbed with the daunting task of replacing Nelson in the starting lineup, but expect the sophomore to have help filling Nelson's shoes – help which has yet to be discovered. It is the potential arrival of such assistance that is allowing Dacko to remain positive.

"We just have to look at it in terms of the fact that every time we've had a key player on the bench or out someone else has stepped up," Dacko said. "We played Michigan for the second time with Ien Butler on the bench and came in at the half up 14.

"We need to see this in a positive light and know that someone is going to step up and help to collectively make up for the lack of what Katie gives to us."

The youthful Lady Rams (10-8, 2-5 A-10), who make the short jaunt to Amherst without a senior on their roster, are also coming off losses to Xavier and Dayton. If Rhody can avenge an early season 59-45 loss to UMass, it can pull even with the Minutewomen (11-7, 3-4 A-10) in the A-10 East. With both Temple and St. Bonaventure lurking at 2-5 in conference play as well, a win tonight is a hot commodity for both teams in the scramble for positioning in the East.

"This is an important one for us," Dacko said. "We need to play as a team and play focused. We've been cheating [on defense] too much and we can't do that anymore. We've worked hard on the basics and hope that will help us to win these tough games."

While URI is young, its scant experience does, however, happen to reside in the backcourt. Junior classmates Denise King and Shayla Johnson enter tonight's contest as the team's two leading scorers, potentially making Nelson's absence that much more glaring. Again, Dacko is counting simply on her team's ability to pull itself up by the bootstraps and begin the righting of the ship together as a group.

"We just need to come together as one," Dacko said. "We can't replace Katie and what she does for us, but we can't focus on her not being there either, because we can't afford to play poorly without her. We need to step up as a team, and now's the time to do it."

UMass' Jennifer Butler is second in the Atlantic 10 in scoring (17.1 ppg) and first in rebounding (14.3 rpg) heading into tonight's home game against Rhode Island.

Ski team searches for respect

most Americans, the first ski racing they were exposed to was the 2002 Winter Olympics.

"The Olympics provide good competition and has become a great event in the past ten years," Vanovac said, "but the best competition is still at the World Cup."

And even though the World Cup is held continually from October until late March, no races are televised in America. Meanwhile, in Europe there are stadiums built to watch the daring speed of the snow spectacle.

Skiing is also a very technical sport. So technical, in fact, that Beau Gibson made two terrific runs in the G.S. on Sunday but still finished second by two-hundredths of a second — a ridiculous measurement of time, which is approximately equal to the time it takes to blink. What contributed to this stunning loss of time? It could have been anything from the subtle loss of grip on a turn to a split second change of mind on how to approach a knoll. It is that competitive.

Skiing also takes a vast amount of dedication. The sheer effort that one puts into the fine tuning of one's skis, training and bus rides out to the mountain is all for around two minutes of skiing. It almost seems illogical to spend that much time for so few moments. However, as you see with Gibson, the slightest difference in tuning or training can give a tiny edge in time, but that just might get you the victory.

Skiing isn't a sport. Oh no, it's much greater than that. It's a culture, and in the following weeks I will introduce you to its wonders.

The countdown to March Madness; Who will challenge for the title?

In about two months, many sports fans will be celebrating their favorite time of the year – March Madness.

Here are five teams with a legitimate chance to make a serious run at the 2003 NCAA National Championship:

5. Florida

These guys are red hot right now. They are coming off big victories over Mississippi State and Georgia. Senior Matt Bonner is playing outstanding, averaging over 15 points per game for the Gators. Matt Walsh, the freshman sensation, is also playing well for Florida, averaging just under 15 per game. Florida has also already beaten Kansas and Maryland, both on the road. The Gators will definitely be tested in the up and coming months as they have to play a tough Kentucky team twice and an Alabama team that is looking like a contender. But no matter what anyone else says, watch out for Bill Donovan and his boys, as they will be making a serious run come tournament time.

4. Oklahoma

The Sooners are right where they want to be. Don't be surprised if you see this team as a No. 1 or No. 2 seed in the brackets come tournament time. Oklahoma lost a heartbreaker to Alabama early in the season, but rebounded from the defeat nicely. Big wins against Connecticut and Michigan State have put the Sooners in the top five. Seniors Hollis Price and Ebi Ere are both averaging over 17 ppg and are looking forward to another great month, as they will have to face a tough Texas team on Feb. 10. The schedule doesn't get any easier for the Sooners, as they must face both a strong Texas Tech team and Missouri in the month of February. They also play a much-improved Kansas team on Feb. 25. But have no fear, the Sooner seniors will have their team ready for another great run.

3. Pittsburgh

Man, do they look good right now. Coming off an impressive victory against the most underrated team in Division I – Syracuse – Pittsburgh is playing its best basketball of the season. Earlier in the season, the Panthers spanked a good Notre Dame team and have been flying high ever since. The great thing about this team is that it can beat you from every angle on the court. If Ontario Lett does not beat you on the glass, then Brandin Knight will beat you with his quickness and his ability to hit a tough jump shot. Both seniors have led this team to greatness so far. Junior Julius Page has also been playing nicely, averaging over 12 ppg for the Panthers. They have tough Georgetown and Connecticut teams coming up, but besides that, look for Pittsburgh to cruise into tournament play with three losses tops.

2. Duke

No surprise here – Duke is on fire again. Every year the Blue Devils remain one of the nastiest teams to play. This year is no different. The Blue Devils have beaten a tough Wake Forest team and a good Georgetown team. They have one of the best freshmen in all the land in JJ Redick, who is averaging over 17 for the Blue Devils. Seniors Chris Duhon and Dahntay Jones have the leadership that is needed for this team to make a run come March. Jones is averaging 16.7 points per game, while Duhon is averaging over eight assists. Do not be surprised if you see this team in the national championship game come spring.

1. Arizona

Arizona is my pick to win the whole thing. The Wildcats are just downright nasty. They have beaten Texas and Oregon – two teams that are excellent. After Kansas, it is smooth sailing for the Wildcats. Arizona has all the weapons that are needed to win it all. The team has an excellent guard in Jason Gardner, who can do it all. He can shoot, pass and has great quickness. Then look at Hassan Adams, who also can do it all. No, seriously, he is sometimes as good as Gardner is. And when opposing teams are not worrying about that awesome one-two punch, then they must focus on Salim Stoudamire, who is shooting over 90 percent from the line. Combine all of that with a healthy Luke Walton and you have a team no one should look forward to facing.

Weekend holds HE implications

UMass' lone active senior, Tim Turner, will lead his squad into battle against Hockey East foes B.C. and P.C. this weekend.

ing between the two clubs, in which UMass blueliner Thomas Pock scored the game-winner in the final minute of play. And PC grabbing just one point in three games against the Warriors means little to Cahoon.

He'd rather focus on the Friars' top trio of Devin Rask, Jon DiSalvatore and Peter Tregoe. The trio, one of the best lines in Hockey East has combined for 37 goals and 53 assists this year. And along with the goaltending duo of veteran Nolan Schaefer and rookie Bobby Goepfert (2.85 GAA, .914 save pct combined), PC has enough power to give any coach insomnia, regardless of its performance against Merrimack.

"They scare me because of those guys, not whether they got points or not," Cahoon said. "Everybody in this league can beat you on any given night."

The Minutemen will still be without the services of senior defenseman Kelly Sickavish who has been out with an injury for the last six weeks. In his absence has been the emerging play of two young blueliners named Dusty Demianuk and Matt Letzer. The two have been given the opportunity to shine in the absence of the team's co-captain.

"We don't have the same balance when Kelly's out of the lineup, but these guys are getting some very valuable game time," Cahoon said.

One could say the same about the rest of the bunch. With so many players getting significant experience before their skates are even broken in Cahoon knows that keeping them focus will prevent them from derailing.

"If I can get these guys to stop worrying about home [or] worrying about the nation-al tournament worrying about where this thing is gonna end up we'll add that all up at the end of the year," he said. "What this weekend is about is playing well."

Prep schools provide education

...vastly different than both high school and college, [but] beneficial to students. The smaller classes and more freedom approach meant that prep school was continuing [in a solid education for both Degon and Avrunin].

"You go to prep school and there are about eight or 10 [in your] class and that's a lot different. Trovato said. "You can't go out there all the time, you can walk over to their dorms and talk to them. The way prep school is run and the way you study in prep school is similar to college. Everything is at night, so it's a little different than regular [high school]."

The tuition structured world of prep school keeps students on a short leash, both academically and socially, which can be problematic for those making the transition from a large public university, where there is much less to keep students on task.

"You go from a prep school where they tell you when to eat, when to drink, when to study, when to go to class, and then you come here and you're on your own now," Degon said. "It's like, What do I do now?' A lot of kids struggle with it but I think the athletic side keeps us in check."

Trovato agreed that hockey helped him keep a set structure.

"It's almost like, as preppy-hood when they guard you and they keep everything regimented, hockey does that for you. They may not be as hands-on, but you know you can't mess up a team, you're going to cost the team or not be playing."

JAMES N. HAFFRA/COLLEGIAN

The UMass men's and women's ski teams both finished in first place this weekend in the giant slalom event at the Plymouth State Carnival in Waterville Valley, N.H.

Ski teams solid in N.H.

WATERVILLE VALLEY, N.H. – While most people at this school were pondering the outcome of the Super Bowl, I was observing the Massachusetts men's and women's ski teams.

Yes, UMass has ski teams. Now that we've established the fact that ski teams do exist, let us run down some of the basics:

The ski team has only one home race this year, which takes place on the mountain they practice at, Berkshire East.

The coaches are two charismatic young men – coach Igor Vanovac and assistant coach Mike LeBlanc. A former Yugoslavian ski racer who is truly a sports character, a la Casey Stengel, Vanovac demands the best out of his skiers. When someone says that they cannot possibly ski faster then they already have, Vanovac tells them, "You can and you will."

LeBlanc provides the motivation before each racer steps to the gate.

"He knows exactly what to say to me right before I race," said Dave Pomeroy, an academic All-American. "He just knows how to get me psyched."

The men's traveling team consists of returning second-team giant slalom and alpine combined All-American Beau Gibson. Pomeroy joins him, along with Chris Pomeroy, Gideon Silverstein, Jay Robbins, Nick Kulkarni, Jonathan Gray, Nick Nacca, Patrick Bachant and Marc Epstein.

The women's traveling team is made up of returning second-team slalom, giant slalom, and alpine combined All-American Carolyn Lewenberg, as well as Caitlin Doughty, Nikki Smith, Molly Lyon, Kerry Devine, Allison Fischer, Shaleighne Collins, Lisbet Raugh, Erica Mains and Kelli Early.

This ski team is not just good; it is dominate. In the 2003 National Coaches Poll, the men were ranked sixth and the women ninth. In the last G.S. (Giant Slalom) race, the ski team won both the men's and women's overall race (see side graphic for results).

So why on earth does no one at UMass know that we have a ski team?

It may be due to the fact that we are blinded by the media blitz focused solely on the major sports at the University (basketball, hockey, and football). On the other hand, skiing is a sport that truly brings national recognition to the University. These are not pampered individuals that are sheltered from the responsibility of the classroom; this is a strong group that has gelled together to create one heck of a team.

The difference in the ski program at UMass from the rest of the division is that Vanovac does not draw most of his recruits from traditional places. This team is made up of a lot of skiers who, before coming to UMass, had only trained competitively on the weekends and raced for non-team oriented organizations.

"At UMass, the skiers do not have the traditional racing background as our opponents, most of whom recruit from ski academies," Vanovac said. "Most of our skiers come from weekend programs [that train only on Saturday and Sunday]. At UMass, we take strong skiers and make them into great racers."

Skiing, as a sport is vastly underrated in America. For

Dayton dominates

Drops Minutemen to 1-6 in Atlantic 10 play

DAYTON, Ohio (AP) – Brooks Hall scored 20 points and Dayton led from the opening basket to beat Massachusetts 83-55 Wednesday night.

Sean Finn and Mark Jones had 12 points apiece, and Ramod Marshall and Nate Green each had 10 for Dayton (14-3, 6-0 Atlantic 10).

Gabe Lee scored 12 and Anthony Anderson had 10 for Massachusetts (7-12, 1-6).

Lee grabbed nine rebounds in the losing effort.

than the Flyers went on a 9-0 run and led by double digits the rest of the way.

Finn had six points and Jones hit a 3-pointer during the 2 1-2 minute span when Dayton took control.

The Flyers, who are receiving votes in both the Associated Press and ESPN/USA Today polls, led 41-25 at halftime and Massachusetts never got closer than 12 points in the second half.

UMass freshman Mawune Kouyate scored the first bucket of his career in eight minutes of play. No. 21 grabbed three rebounds in limited action.

Classmate Mike Lasme, who carried the Minutemen to victory at George Washington Saturday afternoon with 24 points, struggled from the field against Dayton, shooting just 3-for-13 for eight

The Minutewomen will be without the services of point guard Katie Nelson (knee), who is averaging 37 minutes per game, for at least two weeks.

UMass must win without Nelson

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team has arrived at the portion of its regular season schedule commonly known as "the stretch drive," and has found the road to be a bumpy one.

Following consecutive losses to Atlantic 10 West foes Xavier and Dayton, the Minutewomen welcome Rhode Island to the Mullins Center tonight for a crucial border war complete with significant A-10 implications.

Coming off the consecutive setbacks, coach Marnie Dacko is hoping for a better effort from her team. However, she won't be able to count on one very significant cog in her maroon and white machine – point guard Katie Nelson.

The sophomore floor general sustained an injury to her right knee 10 minutes into Sunday's 68-60 loss to the Flyers, and will be out for at least two weeks.

Dacko hopes Nelson's injury, which could be devastating to both team chemistry and execution, will spark the Minutewomen rather than slow them.

"We don't want to put so much emphasis on replacing Katie with one player, but rather on having the rest of the team step up as a whole," Dacko said. "We need everyone to contribute and step up because one

Preparing for the future

Prep school most popular choice for potential college players

By MATT BRADY
Collegian Staff

This is part three of a four-part series exploring the different paths taken to college hockey.

With the puck coming around the boards, Marvin Degon pinches in at the right point only to have the opposing player pop the puck past him and out of the zone. Degon changes direction instantly and hurls back to the defensive zone to break up the challenge. The skill he possesses on the ice is evident, even if he is in terms of maturity, not yet at his peak.

"When you take a kid out of high school ranks or prep school ranks, generally speaking you are looking at his upside. UMass hockey coach Don Cahoon said. "The recruiting process across the board takes that shape. Even the BU – the BCs, the Michigan States of the world for years have been taking the best young players with the idea that they can groom this kid for a couple of years – he's really going to be a sensational player because his upside is so terrific. Then they compliment him with maybe a player that won't grow as much in his ability over the course of four years, but can be a steady performer right from the beginning."

The most popular choice for players moving on to college hockey is attending prep school, whether for an extended period of time or following a full four years of high school.

"Some of the best college players were prep school players," said UMass forward Peter Trovato, who attended Deerfield Academy following a career at legendary Eastern Massachusetts powerhouse Catholic Memorial. "A lot of people are going toward junior hockey now and playing junior hockey is a good route, but if you can go to prep school and get a good education and keep it up athletically, it's a good choice. The top teams are always producing guys that go to BC, Maine and UMass."

With students at very different stages in life – ranging in ages from 15 to 20 – players are often of a wide range of skill and physical ability. But with so much talent being thrust into the prep school pool, the top level of competition is often high-end. Unlike Trovato, Degon attended Cushing Academy for four years, where he became one of the most highly recruited prospects in the state.

"If you look at prep school, compared to college hockey, probably 70 percent of kids in college hockey played prep school somewhere around here," he said. "In my class alone, I think eight of the nine guys went Division I, so competition-wise it was good."

One of the big advantages of prep school hockey over high school is the improvement that students can make physically, which has been beneficial for those moving on to college hockey.

"I played 40 games last year, so this is the same," Degon said. "I think you have to have better balance, because sometimes you get a little too tired toward the end of the season. It's all developmental, you go from one stage to get to the next."

"[The players] are not as big in prep school, but you get a handful of guys that are strong," Trovato said. "When you get here, you get much stronger. With one year of college hockey, you get much more toned and you have a strong base compared to prep school hockey."

But according to both Degon and Trovato, prep school's biggest plus has little to do with hockey.

"Probably the biggest advantage doesn't even have to do with hockey – getting away from home and the school is a lot better than a public school," Degon said. "Hockey-wise, it's better than a regular high school. It competes with juniors, but you get the school out of it. You get the best of both worlds in prep school.

"It prepared me to come to college," he continued. "Moving away from home wasn't a big deal. You learn how to live on your own a little bit."

The education structure of prep

Vital Hockey East weekend for UMass

By ANDY VOGT
Collegian Staff

In terms of effort, two of the Massachusetts hockey team's last four games have been some of its best performances of the year.

In terms of Hockey East standings, these two contests have resulted in zero points in conference.

So what's a coach to do to prevent his young team from getting discouraged?

"If we play like that, more often than not, we're going to succeed," coach Don Cahoon told the audience at the UMass Sports Luncheon on Wednesday. The two losses, a 2-1 overtime decision to New Hampshire on Jan. 17, and a 3-2 defeat to Northeastern on Saturday, left the Minutemen tied with Boston University for the crucial fourth place position in Hockey East.

With two road matchups this weekend against No. 6 Boston College and Providence, UMass will hope to break its recent slump of four losses in its past five games. And with every point a precious commodity in Hockey East, the Maroon and White could use a boost to overtake the Terriers for the final home ice berth.

The Minutemen have split their first two games with both the Eagles and Friars, but on Jan. 3 and 5 they beat the teams in succession (3-2 in Chestnut Hill and 5-4 at the Mullins Center against BC). Boston College will be without the services of freshman Patrick Eaves, out for the season with a fractured vertebra suffered on Dec. 7. But the Eagles will have a healthy Ben Eaves, the team's leading scorer, back in the lineup after the junior sustained an injury in the first period against the Minutemen, as well as Ryan Shannon, who missed the Jan. 3 contest because of the World Juniors Championship.

But Cahoon says that having to contend with these two talented forwards won't change Friday's gameplan.

"You're always conscious when there are great players on the ice," Cahoon said. "But other than trying to defend their power play, and being conscious of them on four-on-four play when there's more ice, our game plan usually revolves around us."

While the Minutemen have hit a skid as of late, the Eagles have started to reach the expectations that come with the territory of being Boston College. After going through a stretch of seven games with just one win, BC has won five of its last six, all Hockey East contests.

Meanwhile, Providence has fallen from the heavens after winning its first eight games. The Friars (13-11-1, 6-8-1 HE) have been somewhat erratic in conference play, as they have defeated BC, BU and Maine (along with UMass), yet finished 0-2-1 against Merrimack.

But Providence likely hasn't forgotten the last meet-

Budget cuts unveiled

COLLEGIAN/KATIE GLYNN

Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey and Finance Secretary Eric Kriss revealed details of Romney's budget-balancing plan which include a five percent reduction in local aid for the remainder of the fiscal year.

By STEVE LEBLANC
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – Gov. Mitt Romney will eliminate more than $75 million in Medicaid funding, $12 million in literacy programs, and $41 million in education spending at all levels to close an estimated $650 million budget gap this year, administration officials said Thursday.

They also presented a city-by-city breakdown of the $114 million reduction in state aid to cities and towns, which Romney outlined in a live television address Wednesday night.

The cut represents about a 5 percent reduction in local aid for the remainder of the fiscal year. Administration and Finance Secretary Eric Kriss said the cut will deplete local budgets an average of 0.7 percent.

Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey and Kriss presented the details of Romney's budget-balancing plan, which includes $343 million in unilateral spending cuts and an additional $142 million in savings that must be approved by the Democrat-controlled Legislature.

Several other agencies, however, received no cuts at all, Kriss said, citing the new Republican governor's promise to protect core services.

"I will not tell you that today's actions have no impact, that no one will be inconvenienced, that no one will be forced to sacrifice," Kriss said. "But seen in a wider context, these emergency actions do not cut into the muscle and bone of government."

Budget hawks and social service providers disagreed.

"I think these cuts today will have an impact on essential government services," said Michael Widmer, president of the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation.

The administration is asking lawmakers to approve additional cuts including $39 million from Medicaid programs, $8 million from affordable housing and $12 million from job training initiatives. Romney will also need legislative approval for his plan to raise the health care premiums from 15 to 25 percent, for a savings of $21 million.

Lawmakers plan to caucus on the proposals Friday and Monday, with public debate beginning as early as next Monday or Tuesday.

"We've been handed a lot of information in a short period of time... but my first impression is that there is a lot of pain across the board," Senate Robert Travaglini, D-Boston said. "It looks like nearly half the cuts continue to decrease human services ... We're going to have to look at that closely."

Healey also said the administration will ask lawmakers to approve legislation to ease state regulations and mandates on cities and towns.

The recommendations include eliminating civil service except for police and firefighters, increasing what municipal workers pay for health insurance, encouraging early retirement and exempting smaller construction projects from the state's prevailing wage law.

Healey said the package could save communities up to $75 million each year.

Among the cuts were: $10 million from a drug prescription program for seniors; $10 million from anti-smoking efforts; $3 million from the new State Police class; $2 million from the Metropolitan District Commission; $3 million from child care programs for low-income families; $3 million from AIDS prevention; and $1 million from teen pregnancy prevention.

Other cuts targeted anti-drug programs, administrative costs at state colleges, a program to revitalize urban areas, housing programs, prostate cancer prevention, breast cancer research and reduced benefits for MassHealth recipients.

Romney is proposing raising an additional $7 million this year from increased fees, including golf fees, boat registration prices, and the cost of highway advertising. Kriss rejected charges that these changes violated Romney's pledge not to raise taxes.

"A fee is something you pay because you get something immediately in return," Kriss said. "A tax is much more indirect. It doesn't have a direct bearing to any kind of service that you might receive."

Judge refuses to reduce charge in murder case

By S.J. PORT
Collegian Staff

Superior Court Judge Bertha Josephson has refused to reduce the charge of murder to manslaughter against former University of Massachusetts student Jennifer Paluseo, who is accused of killing her newborn son after giving birth in the James dormitory last May.

Josephson found after reviewing grand jury transcripts that the panel had been presented with sufficient evidence to return a murder indictment.

In her ruling Tuesday following a Monday proceeding, Josephson said that "based on the evidence presented to the grand jury and the reasonable inferences that can be drawn therefrom, the grand jury was warranted in concluding that there was probable cause to believe that the defendant's actions were the proximate cause of death of the infant."

Paluseo's court-appointed defense attorney Terry Nagel had sought to have the charges against Paluseo, 19, of Plymouth, reduced to manslaughter or dismissed, calling the evidence against his client "sketchy," according to the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Paluseo has two charges against her, the first of which is murder, carrying a mandatory life-sentence. The second charge is the improper removal or conveying of a dead body, a felony charge carrying a three-year maximum sentence.

Prosecutors claim that Paluseo gave birth to a nine-pound, 21-inch baby boy in the second floor bathroom of the all-female dormitory on the morning of May 2, 2002. She then wrapped the child in a towel, cleaned up the mess from the birth in the bathroom and then put the newborn in a black plastic trash bag. According to prosecutors, she then put the bag with the baby inside it in the dormitory trash room, returning to her room to watch television and talk with friends on instant messenger. Paluseo apparently did not discuss the event with anyone prior to being questioned by the police later that morning, after a janitor found the deceased child.

In court Monday, Nagel argued that the grand jury did not have enough solid evidence to charge Paluseo with causing the death of her newborn son.

According to deputy assistant district attorney Renee Steese, who outlined the state's case for the court, the autopsy done by Dr. Joann Richman determined that the baby was not stillborn but had taken a breath. This was determined by air found in his stomach.

Nagel pointed out that Richman couldn't say whether the baby stopped breathing before or after she placed him in the plastic bag.

"The Commonwealth failed to produce any evidence that the death resulted from an act of the defendant," Nagel said in court.

Steese argued that Richman's grand jury testimony, taken in its entirety, provided sufficient evidence to indict Paluseo on charges of murder.

Nagel challenged Steese by saying that Richman could not quantify the probability that the baby stopped breathing on his own.

"The Commnwealth seems to say that the act of concealing a pregnancy...is sufficient to infer that the defendant planned to have a baby and kill it," Nagel told the Gazette.

The Gazette also reported that Paluseo, in attendance at the defense table, "sat slumped and motionless" as Steese recounted the state's version of what happened that morning.

Al-Qaida shoe bomber given life sentence

By DENISE LAVOIE
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – Richard C. Reid, a self-described member of the terrorist group al-Qaida who tried to blow up a trans-Atlantic flight with explosives hidden in his shoes, was dragged from a federal courtroom telling the federal judge who had just sentenced him to life, "You will be judged by Allah!"

Reid, 29, remained defiant, describing himself as a soldier of war and denouncing American policies against Muslim nations. In court Thursday, he angrily denounced American policy toward Islamic countries.

"Your government has sponsored the torture of Muslims in Iraq, and Turkey, and Jordan and Syria with their money and weapons," he said, before then telling the judge "it's in your hands."

U.S. District Judge William Young delivered a patriotic speech praising American ideals and condemning Reid and anti-American terrorists around the world.

"We are not afraid of any of your terrorist coconspirators, Mr. Reid," the judge said. "We are Americans. We have been through the fire before.

"You are not an enemy combatant – you are a terrorist. You are not a soldier in any war – you are a terrorist. To call you a soldier gives you far too much stature. You are a terrorist and we do not negotiate with terrorists. We hunt them down one by one and bring them to justice."

At that, Young pointed to the American flag unfurled behind him.

"You see that flag, Mr. Reid? That's the flag of the United States of America. That flag will fly there long after this is long forgotten."

Young then turned to one of the court officers and yelled, "Custody, Mr. Officer. Stand him down." Before handcuffs could be placed on Reid, he leaned across defense table and pointed at the judge, raising his voice he said, "You are not going to stand me down. You will be judged by Allah."

As Reid sought to justify his actions, several of the crew members who were on board the flight looked stunned, glancing at each other and shaking their heads. One woman cried and wiped tears from her face.

He was then taken from the courtroom in handcuffs, struggling the whole way.

Reid, a British citizen, admitted he tried to ignite shoe bombs aboard American Airlines Flight 63 on Dec. 22, 2001, three months after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks left many Americans afraid to fly.

Reid had faced 60 years to life in prison for trying to down the American Airlines flight bound from Paris to Miami. Prosecutors said there was enough plastic explosives in his shoes to blow a hole in the fuselage and kill all 197 people aboard.

First Assistant U.S. Attorney Gerard T. Leone Jr. told the judge that in Reid's mind "the religion of Islam justifies the killing of innocent civilians. In his mind, the horrific and homicidal attacks of Sept. 11 were but a missed opportunity."

Passengers and crew members overpowered Reid, using seat belts and their own belts to strap him to his seat. Two doctors who were passengers injected him with sedatives, and the flight was diverted to Boston.

When Reid pleaded guilty last October, he said he was a member of al-Qaida, pledged his support to terrorist leader Osama bin Laden and declared himself an enemy of the United States.

"Basically, I got on the plane with a bomb. Basically I tried to ignite it. Basically, yeah, I intended to damage the plane," Reid said that day with a laugh.

His lead lawyer, Owen Walker, argued that Reid should be considered a soldier of war and part of a "current historical phenomenon that we don't understand." Reid's lawyers say Reid credits his religion with saving him from a life of drug use and despair. They describe a troubled childhood and young adulthood, when Reid was plagued by poverty, feelings of uselessness, racism and crime. Reid is the son of a British mother and a Jamaican father.

Reid had tried furiously to light a match to his shoes but he was unable to ignite the fuse. Authorities have speculated Reid's shoes may have been too moist from sweat.

Three flight attendants struggled with Reid after they smelled sulfur from the matches. Attendant Hermis Moutardier told authorities Reid put a lit match in his mouth when she confronted him, then later tried to touch another match to the tongue of his sneaker.

Moutardier said she tried to grab the shoe, but Reid pushed her to the floor and she screamed for help. Attendant Carole Nelson said 75 to 100 passengers jumped up from their seats and headed for Reid when they saw him struggling with flight attendants.

"He was like a wild animal," Nelson testified last June. On Thursday, Nelson pleaded with the judge for a life sentence.

"I believe that Richard Reid was on a mission of evil, a mission of destruction and a mission of murder," she said. "Richard Reid put all of us on this flight under great stress and trauma."

Federal authorities had been preparing for a high-security trial. But Reid stunned prosecutors when he said he wanted to plead guilty to spare his family the pain and publicity a trial would bring.

In their sentencing memorandum, prosecutors called Reid "a committed terrorist who will remain so until his dying days."

"By his own words, Reid refuses to apologize for attempting to kill 200 people," U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan wrote. "Perhaps even more appalling, he blames the American people for the horrendous attacks and casualties caused by the al-Qaida terrorism organization to which he claims allegiance.g

The FBI believes Reid had help making the bomb from "an al-Qaida bomb maker," and authorities have said they found unidentified hair and a palm print on the explosives.

Professor to be advisor to provost

By DAN LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

Richard Rogers, a professor of resource economics at the University of Massachusetts, has been appointed faculty advisor to the provost for undergraduate education, according to Charlena Seymour, provost and senior vice chancellor for academic affairs.

"Professor Rogers has the outstanding credentials, experience and the talent to get this job and everything else done in the best way possible," Seymour said.

The faculty advisor to the provost for undergraduate education works closely with the provost and her staff, deans and department heads, and the student affairs staff. Rogers will be responsible for helping to implement programs and policies to strengthen undergraduate education on campus. He assumed his new role on Jan. 27, with the appointment effective for two years.

"I'm delighted to be named to this position," Rogers said. "Since arriving at UMass, I have been committed to providing quality undergraduate education and to conducting research that enhances my professional standing as well as our collective reputation."

"As always, the campus is committed to providing a quality educational experience to our undergraduate students," Seymour said.

One immediate priority according to Seymour is to establish a computerized tracking system that assists students in meeting degree requirements.

"As our chancellor is fond of saying, 'Teaching and research lie at the heart of the academic imperative,'" Rogers said. "I'm pleased that the creation of this position at UMass reinforces the symmetric importance of both teaching and research."

Rogers joined the resource economics faculty at UMass in 1984 and is currently a faculty associate to the Center for Teaching. He received a 1994-1995 University Distinguished Teaching Award and was also the first recipient of the annual Outstanding Teacher Award presented by the College of Food and Natural Resources in 1990.

He was also named to a Lilly Teaching Fellowship in 1989-1990 and has served as a mentor to the Lilly Teaching Fellows program in 1994-1995 and 1997-1998.

According to the Department of Resource Economics Web site, Rogers' main concerns for the University are to provide high quality education at an affordable price.

"I am an advocate of affordable education that allows students to gain access to society's best jobs," he said. "I sincerely believe quality education expands opportunities allowing training and ability to replace privilege in determining who gets ahead in this world."

Troop buildup in Gulf to increase

By Robert Burns
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – The buildup of U.S. troops in the Persian Gulf region is now approaching 90,000 land, sea and air forces, and that number will likely double within two weeks, officials said Thursday.

Nearly a third of the total is in Kuwait, which would be the main launching pad for a U.S.-led invasion to disarm Iraq.

The Pentagon is not announcing either specific unit deployments or the arrival of forces in the Gulf area, but officials familiar with details of the buildup said it is growing steadily and by thousands each week.

By mid-February there are expected to be nearly 180,000 troops in the region, and the total could reach 250,000 later.

The Bush administration hopes the accumulation of U.S. and allied military firepower on Iraq's peripheral borders will persuade President Saddam Hussein either to decide to disarm or to flee his country. President Bush said Thursday that exile by Saddam and members of his inner circle was one possible peaceful solution.

"Hopefully, the pressure of the free world will convince Mr. Saddam Hussein to relinquish power," Bush said.

Small numbers of American troops already are in areas of northern Iraq not controlled by the government, Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Wednesday there were "no significant numbers" there now, but he declined to say more.

U.S. military psychological warfare is continuing with leaflet drops from U.S. aircraft designed to rattle Iraq's government, turn more Iraqis against their government and intimidate its military.

American planes on Thursday dropped 480,000 leaflets over or near five cities in southern Iraq, Central Command said. It was the eighth leaflet drop in January and the 18th since Oct. 2002. The latest leaflets carried a variety of messages, including a warning that military fiber optic sites in southern Iraq have been targeted for destruction by U.S. aircraft because they are part of Iraq's integrated air defense system. The leaflets warned that anyone caught repairing the sites could be bombed.

The president met at the White House on Thursday with Myers, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the military's top commanders, including Gen. Tommy Franks of Central Command, who would run a war against Iraq. Most of Franks' battle staff, who normally operate from Tampa, Fla., are at a command post in Qatar, and Franks would be expected to go there soon unless the momentum toward war is reversed.

Franks could launch an attack on Iraq as early as mid-February, but officials say a more optimum time would be late February or March.

During a visit to the Middle East last week, Franks clinched an agreement with Jordan to allow the stationing of some U.S. troops there, including some to operate Patriot air defense missile systems and others for potential search-and-rescue missions from Jordanian airfields, according to a U.S. official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

American warplanes also would be allowed to pass through Jordanian airspace during an Iraq war, the official said.

Although the main ground attack would come from Kuwait into southern Iraq, the Pentagon wants to open a northern front to keep Iraqi forces split. It may do that by having the Army's 4th Infantry Division attack from Turkey. That unit's equipment is en route to the Gulf region but its 16,500 soldiers still await word to move out.

More than 26,000 U.S. troops are now in Kuwait, and the number will continue to grow.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Massachusetts should ready itself for another awful blow

Brace for impact.

Once again the University of Massachusetts should be on the lookout for the light fingers of the governor's office, as Mitt Romney and his lieutenant governor Kerry Healey prepare to lift UMass' already thin wallet.

The impact, as it may be, would include another slash in the numerical category of millions. Thursday, in a televised address, Healey outlined the governor's plans for $343 million in tax cuts statewide. Of that rather large figure, $41 million has been earmarked as education cuts.

Education has suffered such blows in the recent past. Last year, when acting governor Jane Swift got out the red pen, she struck higher-ed and UMass was certainly included.

So the already threadbare budget here – and at state schools across the commonwealth – is about to be depressed further. But what does this mean?

Surely it will reduce the paper count at Xerox machines in our scholastic departments. Additionally necessary renovations will fall by the wayside, those who make the repairs will suffer cuts, professors will choose to leave or be forced with the alternative – generally everyone will suffer.

Part of the problem we will see, and have seen, is that we need a stronger force pulling for us. Years ago when William Bulger took the helm of the UMass system he was praised as someone who could use his connections to get some pull in the government for the schools.

But what sort of results have we seen?

We have been downsized, time and time again, and some departments are at the brink of extinctions.

It is almost humorous to watch which departments get hit the hardest. Without fail the humanities will suffer. Liberal arts departments have taken a hefty amount of punishment by cuts thus far.

Last year there was talk of combining departments – journalism and English for instance – and reducing the number of professionals we have in these sections.

As recent as 2000 Bulger was telling prospective students that the heart of an education rested in the humanities. He would herald the classics, literature courses, learning a foreign language and the importance of a liberal arts education to those he met and talked with.

And now these options he once propped up are having their very foundations chipped away.

Healey said that these budget cuts will not cut at the "muscle and bone of government," instead saying that there will be sacrifices and a broad impact. But if education is not part of the muscle and bone of government, what is?

Thomas Jefferson once said "whenever the people are well-informed, they can be trusted with their own government." This becomes difficult with a weakened education system. How then does Romney plan on keeping the people well-informed?

So I guess I'm 'other'

Yousef Munayyer

Does anyone else ever wonder what to fill in when asked to identify your race or ethnicity on an application? There are several choices and many times one may be baffled when considering what they are or are not. There is of course white, which is what most people in this country select, and there is black/African-American, Hispanic, Asian, Pacific Islander, Native American and other. It's a good thing they stuck that last one in there or I would not have known where to go.

I'm an Arab; so that defiantly doesn't make me Hispanic and I'm not black or African-American either. I'm sure I'm not Native American and I'm pretty sure I wouldn't be a Pacific Islander, even though I'm not really sure what that is. (Would a native of New Zealand be considered a Pacific Islander?) So that leaves us with Asian, white and other. I was born on the Asian continent, but I don't think the people who are going to read my application have the same geographical conception of Asia as I do.

Now down to white and other. The State Department wants me to believe I am white. Well, the only thing that is white is the crack they're smoking if they think the Arab people and whites are similar in any ethnic or cultural way. And what about people from India, Pakistan or Bangladesh, are they white or Asian? (If there is enough reason to differentiate pacific islanders from Asians there should be a difference between white and Arab.) So I'm left with other.

I have been selecting "other" on every application on which the question has been asked of me. But why is this important? What does it matter if you're black or white or other? Well, to universities, which for most of us were the last place we filled out an application for that asked this type of question, this is very important. They need to seem diverse. A university doesn't want to be looked at as a discriminating community; it wants to be a learning community. And a learning community needs to be diverse or so that is what we are told.

I agree with that. I think many different cultures and perspectives help to shape an individual and prepare them for things they will encounter in the future. So affirmative action is a good idea? Not exactly. Recently in the news, we heard about the University of Michigan's criteria for accepting applicants. It seems that minority students (Hispanics, blacks, Native Americans, and Asians) get 20 points towards acceptance where as any student who scores a 1600 on the SAT would only get 12 points. Isn't that ridiculous?

Think about that for a second, a student who could have received poor scores, poor grades, and had little achievements would get almost twice as many points as a student who scores a perfect grade on the SAT just because they were born into a particular birthday suit. I do not think the SAT is an extremely accurate way of determining an applicant's capabilities, but I do think it's more important than what color skin they have. I thought the whole idea behind affirmative action was to eliminate prejudice in the admissions and employment areas. Instead the policy seems to be doing the exact opposite. A white student could loose crucial points because of the color of their skin and this is not just, not fair, and not constitutional.

"People who aren't as bright as three-watt light bulbs in rolling blackouts could make it into a good school..."

And another thing: what exactly is a minority anyway? The word gives the impression that the people it describes are not of the majority. That seems to be a simple way of thinking about it. However, Arabs (which I have yet to be convinced of their whiteness) make up a less significant portion of the population than African Americans, Hispanic or Asian people. I'm sure statistics would not be very different for Indians, Persians, and people of the Asian "sub-continent" (another vague "geo-racial" term used to save space as opposed to printing several ethnicities).

Affirmative action also fails to accommodate lower class whites and white immigrants. Let's not forget that the people who enacted the affirmative action legislation were mostly rich, white, upper-class politicians whose children would not experience trouble getting into good schools simply because their daddy is a big shot. People who aren't as bright as three-watt light bulbs in rolling blackouts could make it into a good school because their father or mother spends time in the beltway. How is that fair?

Some argue that this is the best system agreed upon as of yet and that even though many unqualified applicants are getting admitted to good schools, it helps level the playing field. I think the system needs some work. First of all, race based decisions have to go. We cannot expect to get rid of prejudice by prejudging applicants because of their race. It doesn't make sense.

What should be considered, instead of giving extra government funding to diverse higher learning institutions, is that some or most of that money should go to funding inner city schools which need it the most. That way, in a few years, the playing field would be more level and we would not have to put up with rejection letters that say, "It was a very competitive year and we received many applicants," but mean, "sorry, you were just too white for us." Until the system is looked over and reformed we will be stuck at this point where racism is not decreasing, but remains clearly evident.

In the mean time I know one thing, I'm "other." And I have to wonder what Trent Lott thinks about that?

SGA struggles upstream

Scott Eldridge II

After holding barely legal elections in the fall with a mere five and one half percent of the student body voting and needing five percent to ratify – the Student Government Association made a joke of the first semester. They made the usual proclamations that addressed a pittance of pressing issues and wasted a lot of time.

This semester as budget worries loom large the SGA seems to be off on the right foot, back to protecting the student interest.

However there are some things that still need to be looked at.

SGA leadership needs to play master of the house and know what is going on with all that involves its constituents. Dave Carr, as leader of this fragile and in some cases already broken government body, you need to establish a place for you within the context of the system as a whole.

For instance, you heralded a successful campaign where there would be a Blue Wall bar. Alcohol not being the major aspect of our institution, the idea of a bar in the ever-populated campus eaters would hopefully bring more students to the center of campus, or so you hoped and proclaimed.

I won't fault you for the fact that since the initial idea was put forth we have heard little more of this bar. The word now is the watering hole will be here in March.

And I suppose that is a minor consideration. Plenty of things could have gone wrong; maybe enough didn't go right to get it here by this week. If nothing else the bar situation should show you just how precarious a situation it can be to promise something so specifically. (Isn't ambiguity a key aspect of politics?)

More pressing issues, beyond convenient booze, would be the alcohol policies revolving around housing, tailgating, and the committee you were on. It appears that you were in the younger demographic on that committee. You said that there was not enough student input on the task force.

Don't you represent the students, aren't you our elected officials? Maybe I misunderstood.

Bill Powers. Whenever I start reading a story about the SGA or attend a meeting I am just anxious to see what sort of drivel you put forth. I am sure you are a great person, and have plenty of characteristics that can't be contrived through a news story or the slightly formal dealings of your officer's report, but you need to anchor yourself in the role of student representative.

Particularly irritating is the way you went into nauseating detail about your ride home for Thanksgiving (the epitome of irrelevant for all those in attendance). Your colleagues were jumping at the hit to shut you up, next time heed their comments.

The seemingly endless debate over the police dog has really confused me. The dog, Max, was reported on in the Nov. 26 Collegian. Still, at the Dec. 11 senate meeting you were discussing this concrete addition to the University police force.

Dan Saunders, you questioned the applicability of a drug-sniffing dog. If there are drugs on campus, and we all know there are, then it is college per usual. If police are coming across caches of drugs, paraphernalia and $24,000 in cash when they are looking for a stolen laptop it appears to me that there is a problem that may warrant young officer Max.

So I suggest taking the blinders off. In fact, from what I've seen, you are missing other aspects of the world you work in. When did it become the resident assistant's job to police the halls for drugs? (Note that I wrote resident assistant, not advisor as you are oft quoted.) You seem to think that these student employees have two things they don't. A) RAs are not police-trained investigators, security personnel or involved in law enforcement to any great extent. B) RAs are students, which means it is not and never should be their full time job to be searching out the campus drug traffic.

Others have made more subtle rifts in the student world, Gabe Tavarez, you are as much the brutish ignoramus that you were when I first met you two years ago. I hope you realize that every camera you shove away and every journalist you close the door on is a legal infraction. Read up, oh, rough and tumble elections chair.

Olaf Aprans, senator and editor of "The Minuteman." You take your personal vendettas to the floor. You and Rene Gonzales need to realize that your voices at these meetings must too be the voices of your constituents. Gonzales has the convenience of an entourage to support his comments, but your taking of Senate matters and those unique to your political ideals back and forth between the paper and the floor is inappropriate.

It has always been interesting to watch the SGA doggy paddle their way through the year, hopefully they can still save themselves from drowning.

Fire's harsh reality

Ed Comeau

Last week, 20-year-old junior Wendy Carman died in an off-campus apartment fire at Tufts University. She lived in a makeshift apartment over a garage that was accessed by climbing a ladder and then crawling through an opening into a room where she slept. This area was equipped with heating, so the landlord had apparently meant it to be used as a living space. The Medford Building Commissioner stated that no permit had ever been taken out to modify the garage for an apartment.

Because of the extensive damage, the official cause of the fire cannot be determined, but according to Massachusetts State Fire Marshal Coan, one of the likely causes is careless disposal of smoking materials. An official reported finding a smoke detector in the debris, but its battery was missing.

There are certainly a lot of things that went wrong that led to Wendy's death: an illegal apartment with no safe way out, careless smoking, a disabled smoke detector. These are factors that we have seen in fatal fires in the past, and we will probably see again. Over the past three years, 75 percent of all student fire fatalities nationwide have occurred in off-campus housing.

"Over the past three years, 75 percent of all student fire fatalities nationwide have occurred in off-campus housing."

As students move back into houses and apartments for another semester, I encourage you to look at where you live with a new eye on "how can I prevent a fire?" and if one does break out, "how will I get out?" Every apartment and house should have at least one working smoke detector as is required by law. If there isn't one where you live, have the landlord install one or get one yourself. A $10.00 investment can save your life. And please do not disable it by taking out the battery or covering it over. The Delta Upsilon fraternity learned the hard way what a covered smoke detector can contribute to: its house burned down.

Smoking is the leading cause of fire fatalities in all home and apartment fires in the United States. About one-fourth of all fatalities occur because someone is careless in disposing of his cigarettes.

I know that housing is hard to find, and I remember when I was an undergraduate that I lived in a house where we "modified" it so that each of us would have privacy. In looking back, I now realize how lucky we were, that none of us became a statistic.

Please take a few moments to learn a few basic fire safety tips. Save a life. Yours.

Could 'Kangaroo Jack' be bouncing over the line?

Warner Brothers' latest release includes material not for kids

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

When one's mind is so obsessed with the premise for a new family film (a debatable topic which will be tackled later), "Kangaroo Jack" seems like something that should've happened a long time ago.

'Kangaroo Jack'
Directed by David McNally
Starring: Jerry O'Connell Anthony Anderson
Warner Brothers
Rated PG
93 mins.

The theme of man being outwitted, outlasted and outsmarted by nature or, more specifically, animal is not by any means a new concept. A few years ago, the amusing kiddie-flick "Mouse Hunt" placed two bumbling oafs with a pesky rodent. "Kangaroo Jack" is the same idea – only now with a cute marsupial hopping all over the Australian Outback. Again, find two goofy guys trying to track him down, one of course always appearing smarter than the other.

True, "Kangaroo Jack" can't be credited for its originality, apart from transplanting the common theme to another environment with a different animal to chase. And true, some of its content is questionable for the young audience the studio targets. Regardless, I can't see how anyone could not like the cute, computer animated Kangaroo Jack. But I digress; even an adorable animal can sometimes not save an entire film, even if it can rap.

The trailers for the movie itself are slightly deceiving since they show Jack breaking into a "Roo rendition of 'Rapper's Delight.'" Spoiler ahead, folks: Jack doesn't actually talk. It's only a two-minute dream sequence (if that long), and apart from this, he stays pretty tight-lipped except for a few outtakes at the end of the film. This is unfortunate, because "Kangaroo Jack" only came fully alive in these few moments. In short, the film could've used a little more Aussie talk from the 'Roo to keep it giddy. It's not that the movie drags, per se, there's plenty of running, jumping and butt-kicking in its short running time. However, Jack is much more entertaining than any of his human co-stars, who take more screen time than desired.

Jerry O'Connell and Anthony Anderson team up as the two imbeciles who accidentally have $50,000 of mob money stolen by the hoppy kangaroo – cash they were supposed to deliver to an enigmatic Mr. Smith. When the pair accidentally hit Jack with their car, they dress him up in their clothes and take pictures. Now, while a typical movie-going audience knows a movie won't kill its title character within the first 20 minutes, there's some sense of animal cruelty revealed as the duo not only plow down the marsupial, but also dress up its supposed corpse for their own pleasure. In retaliation, Jack gets hopping mad at the mistreatment and takes off with the wad of cash in the pocket of the jacket he is dolled up in. From there, the plot races off for the next hour or so, as the men attempt to retrieve the stolen moolah.

COURTESY IMDB.COM

With a simplistic enough plot, can one still consider "Kangaroo Jack" a family film? Movie studios these days are pushing the envelope when it comes to recent films in the genre. On one hand, Hollywood is finally catching on that kids are smarter than the trite offerings some studios have rolled out, but the other hand leaves one questioning just where studio executives should draw the line prior to the film's release.

In "Kangaroo Jack," there's talk of testicles, alcoholism and sex as well as the minor animal mistreatment previously mentioned – all the risqué topics are meant to fly over children's heads and target an older audience for a laugh. Only trouble is, what if kids viewing the film are smart enough to know exactly what's going on? Should youngins' hear some of this dialogue? The decision is ultimately left to the ticket buyer, even if it does not bode well with me.

As a 21-year-old movie lover, I had a good time at "Kangaroo Jack." I expected nothing from it and got hardly anything in return; there was nothing lost. Others, I predict, will either love or hate it, most likely kids loving and adults hating.

But at least no one can take away the adorable looks of that loveable Jack.

Despite looking like what might be a good movie for children, 'Kangaroo Jack' pushes the limit with dirty jokes and innuendos.

Aguilera's vocals remain strong but fully 'Stripped' of diversity

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

Forget the garish "Dirty" single and video. Christina Aguilera's latest "Stripped" is nothing like the tarty kickoff track. As a pop record, "Stripped" is a solid sophomore album. In fact, the highlights outnumber the low points. And most impressive is Aguilera's restraint of performing vocal gymnastics with her multi-octave vocals — something she's had trouble doing in the past.

Christina Aguilera
'Stripped'
RCA

The once squeaky-clean bottle-blond "Genie In a Bottle" has since morphed into a make-up splattered, barely clothed singer. She's still capable of blowing everyone away with her steel pipes but overshadows that ability with her latest look. Her sudden trashy and tasteless style seems more like an attempt to garner attention than anything else. Considering Aguilera has never been able to escape from Mariah Carey's or Britney Spears' shadow, her dire need for an all-eyes-on-me attitude isn't all that surprising. However, if you're able to look past her current tacky look you'll find some impressive music on "Stripped."

The female empowerment anthems are aplenty on "Stripped." "Can't Hold Us Down," featuring fellow "Lady Marmalade" singer Lil' Kim, is sugary hip-hop at its best. The mid-tempo "Fighter," where ex-Jane's Addiction guitarist Dave Navarro offers crunching guitar licks is another track resembling "I get knocked down but I get up again." Blaring drums and her deep-throated vocals coalesce to form some mean attitude. The fittingly titled "Soar" is a self-esteem-building anthem.

"Walk Away" is a can't-let-go tearjerker. "Infatuation" is sensual flamenco at its best, and the velvety soft "Loving Me 4 Me" is an R&B classic. All are great cuts.

There was no need for Aguilera to dress like a skank. But those who wrote off Aguilera for her tawdry look will be surprised to find that "Stripped" is full of sure-to-be-hits that will help Aguilera further her musical reign.

Leaping from one musical genre to the other, however, does make Aguilera's intentions seem forced. The psychedelic pop of "Make Over," where her vocals are run through a vocoder, comes across as more of a parody than actual progression for the singer. And oftentimes, the guitar riffs throughout the album sound gimmicky at first, but with each listen a layer of skin is stripped, so to speak, revealing a deeper, more genuine sound.

The album hits its peak on the Motown-influenced "Impossible," written and produced by Alicia Keys. It is a soaring ballad pleading a silent boyfriend to open up; an elegant and sophisticated torch song.

The disturbing guitar-based ballad "I'm Okay" revisits her father's abusive behavior. The track, produced by 4 Non Blondes front woman Linda Perry and creative force behind Pink's "Missundaztood," possesses tender and soul-stirring vocals: "Bruises fade father but the pain remains the same/ And I still remember how you kept me so afraid." Perry produced a number of other singles: the gorgeous "Beautiful," the sparkling "Cruz," and the aforementioned misguided "Make Over."

In the end, diversity is the album's greatest drawback. While Aguilera takes a number of chances, the album ultimately lacks that ever-important ingredient necessary to cook a great album: coherency. It's difficult to go from poppy ballad to a guitar-driven cut without sounding a little jaded. At a lengthy hour and 17 minutes, Aguilera obviously tried to smash all assumptions in one record. Ever heard of "one step at a time," Christina?

Video game sequel does more than justice to movie original

There are always video games made to represent some of the worst and best movies ever made. Some make better movies than games, and some go above and beyond the original film. For Vivendi Universal, they have recently produced one of the best a game based on John Carpenter's 1982 thriller "The Thing."

'The Thing'
PC
Published by Vivendi Universal
Action
Rated M for mature

"The Thing" makes for a better video game sequel to the original movie and does so better than a film version of the story would have been able to. It works to Carpenter's advantage as it makes the player curious about the original movie, thus putting some cash in the director's pocket. Those who have seen the film will notice the game has captured every little detail – from the crash site to the block of ice that the alien was extracted from.

Look for thrilling tasks in 'The Thing,' based on John Carpenter's film.

This game closely resembles the PC smash "Half-Life," but is far more advanced in many aspects, including its squad system. "The Thing" allows for a group of up to four people to follow the player's orders. (The group's level of obedience is of course based on their sanity and level of trust toward the player). The player will order engineers, soldiers and medics around to make his way through the levels of creepy crawling creatures. Along the way, the player faces the problem of group members going insane and shooting team members or even turning into monsters themselves.

If there's one game everyone should at least try, it's "The Thing." It produces hours of horrifying entertainment while sticking close to the original storyline.

Holmes Brothers' joyful noise fills house

By Chris Flouton-Barnes
Collegian Staff

CAMBRIDGE – It was a numbingly frigid night on the streets of Harvard Square, but for the throng in the attic of the House of Blues there was no difficulty staying warm during two steaming sets of righteous gospel and blazing blues by the Holmes Brothers.

The New York-based trio exerted a captivating stage presence and veteran cohesion during gospel numbers like "When I Lay My Burden Down" for the packed floor during the first set. Another gospel classic, "Precious Lord," brought drummer "Popsy" Dixon out from behind his kit to sing over a poetical piano and bass accompaniment.

The band then swung towards the blues end of their tour the "Continuum of Glorious Music," cranking up the intensity on "New & Improved Me." Guitarist Wendell Holmes ripped through half a dozen choruses, ratcheting his solo up another notch at each turnaround as brother Sherman Holmes swelled through octaved crescendos on bass.

Renowned as much for their stellar vocalizations as for their airtight jams, the trio produced gorgeous harmonies on the soul chestnut "Love Train," and again on the bluesy "Man of Peace."

Brother Wendell captured the vibe of the night exactly when he said, "Everything is comin' up roses!" Breaking into the stirring strains of "Amazing Grace," the two brothers' rich harmonies were augmented by Dixon's soaring falsetto.

Before the sanctified aura had waned a whit, a devilishly deliberate rendition of Jimmy Reed's "Tell Me What You Want Me to Do" started the hips a-grindin' once again as tension built during the vocal breaks of the chorus. It is hard to tell whether the Holmes Brothers would make better pitchmen for a Saturday night church service or whether they would be more persuasive promoting a Sunday morning juke joint. The obvious solution would be to book the band for both gigs and sleep it all off Monday.

Though the crowd had thinned by the late start of the second set, the Brothers continued to pour it on. Sherman Holmes took lead vocals for "Speaking in Tongues," the title track from their last Alligator Records release, while Brother Wendell ground out the bombastic chords of the chorus on guitar. A cover of Ben Harper's "Homeless Child" continued the trend in mountainous bass lines and full-throated hooks.

A couple of slow gospel burners and one all-out funk guitar freak-out later and the band wound things down for the night with the old-timey stalwart "Will the Circle Be Unbroken."

Like a woolen scarf across America, the Holmes Brothers' dual attack of blues and gospel kept the temperature up all night long, with hearts pumping and feet tapping to the closely-knit fabric of their musical tapestry. Bridging the gap between the bottle and the Bible, the party and the preacher, the Brothers left the freezing faithful with a shining example of the all-encompassing potential of music from the soul.

Game Three; Round One

Six degrees of Kevin Bacon

Jake D. Lewis

A popular Hollywood myth states actor Kevin Bacon is somehow connected to every other actor in show business by no more than "six degrees." A single degree being the unit describing a link between a given movie star and someone else who has appeared on-screen with him/her. Rumor states every puzzle has at least one solution.

To play, send your answers along with your name, university or college, major and year to collegianbacon@hotmail.com by no later than noon on Sunday. Winners and points accumulated from correct answers will be printed in Monday's Collegian Arts and Living.

This round will conclude on Feb.14.

Woods' domination came at painful price

The one-hour surgery removed fluid from inside and around the anterior cruciate ligament, and removed benign cysts. Woods' doctor said the long-term recovery prospects are good.

"But once you've had the procedure done, you're susceptible to having the same procedure," Woods said.

"Hopefully, that won't be the case."

Woods never got too far away from golf. He putted on his carpet, chipped into pillows and onto his bed, and started hitting wedges by the end of the year.

The real test comes this week.

Woods said hasn't felt any pain since he started hitting a few practice balls at his home outside Orlando, Fla.

"I need to know if this knee will hold up in a full practice session," he said. "Once I know that, I'll be fine competing. I may be rusty when it comes to hitting one shot. Playing my way into shape is going to take a little time."

There could be some interesting ramifications.

Woods is closing in on Byron Nelson's record of making 113 consecutive cuts on the PGA Tour. He is at 96, and narrowly avoided the week-end off at Torrey Pines last year.

He is also going for a record fifth straight money title. During his rehabilitation, Ernie Els won the first two tournaments of the year in Hawaii, and Vijay Singh won in Phoenix.

"I'm anxious to get back out. I really am," Woods said. "I'm anxious to compete. As far as them, that's great. It's going to be a challenge, because they're both doing well."

When he does return, the Masters looms. Woods will be going for an unprecedented third straight title at Augusta National.

"It's going to be one heck of a challenge – hopefully, one I'll be prepared for," he said.

There might not be any way to prepare for what awaits at Augusta National and the protests over its all-male membership.

Martha Burk of the National Council of Women's Organizations and Jesse Jackson both have vowed to protest outside the gates unless the club invites a woman to join. Chairman Hootie Johnson has said that won't happen any time soon.

Woods said he won't be distracted.

"I'll be fine," he said. "Once it's time to play, it's time to play. Whether it's all the things outside the gates, or the fact I'm trying to win three in a row – all that goes away once it's time to tee it up."

Tiger Woods is recovering from surgery that removed fluid from around the anterior cruciate ligament in his left knee.

All-Star forward may return to C's tonight

By Howard Ulmam
Associated Press

WALTHAM, Mass. (AP) – A limping Antoine Walker expects to return to the Boston Celtics lineup Friday night wearing a large brace to protect his injured right knee.

The all-star forward has missed four games, a rare absence for a player who missed just 10 in his first six seasons, and was growing frustrated exhorting his teammates from the bench.

"Right now, 10, 12 days is too long for me to sit out. I've got to get back out there," Walker said Thursday after participating in his first full practice since spraining a knee ligament Jan. 20 in a 100-99 win at Philadelphia in which he hit the winning basket.

Barring any serious soreness or other carryover from the workout, he said he's confident he'll play Friday against Detroit.

"If he was able to do (Friday) what he did today in practice, then he's going to play," said coach Jim O'Brien, who will make a decision shortly before the game. "Some days when you have an injury, you come back and it's really extra sore. So you make a decision to rest it a little bit longer.

"But we're optimistic. We think there's a very good chance that he'll play, but we have to wait and see."

Without the brace, Walker limps.

"That's not going to stop for a while," he said.

With the brace, he runs up and down the court and side to side. His cuts are sharp and his shooting form is smooth. He didn't try to dunk at practice, but knows that may happen in the heat of the game.

"That's probably my biggest thing, playing with the brace, because it restricts the movement and it stops some things. But I've got to get comfortable playing with it," Walker said.

Boston has five games before the all-star game on Feb. 9, and Walker hopes he can shed the brace after that.

In his absence, Boston is 2-2 and Paul Pierce, the team's other all-star, has taken more responsibility, including the first triple-double of his career. But the Celtics could have used Walker at Detroit on Tuesday night when they lost 86-83 after leading in the final minute.

"Over the last four games we're 2-2. We should be 3-1," O'Brien said.

The Celtics also have been without guard Tony Delk, their third leading scorer, for four of the last six games. He has an ankle injury and may return Friday.

O'Brien expects his players to produce even if some are sidelined.

"I don't talk to them privately about how they deal with injuries," he said. "When somebody is out, we play the people that are healthy."

Walker is second to Pierce on the Celtics with 21.8 points and 7.5 rebounds per game and is averaging 4.3 assists. He's the key ball handler and takes charge of setting up offensive plays.

Without him, the players "played well. They've made some crucial mistakes down the stretch," he said.

With Walker sidelined, Pierce has played more of an all-around game, Walter McCarty has taken, and hit, more shots, and point guard J.R. Bremer has distributed the ball well. When Walker returns, those roles will revert to him.

He's so eager to play that he even accompanied the Celtics to last Tuesday's game in Detroit, even though the club wanted him to stay home.

"If I stayed at home, I would probably be pulling my hair out," Walker said.

A royal performance

King's 23 points lead Lady Rams past shorthanded Minutewomen

By ANDREW MERRITT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Denise King led all scorers with 23 points as the Rhode Island Rams beat the Massachusetts women's basketball team 66-57 last night at the Mullins Center.

Rhode Island (11-8, 3-5 A-10) never led by more than nine, but managed to capitalize on many of the Minutewomen's 20 turnovers. King also went to the foul line 16 times, converting on 14 of those opportunities.

In the end, the Rams won the sloppy game by avoiding more mistakes than the Maroon and White (11-8, 3-5 A-10). They upped their advantage to nine three times in the second half, but never pulled away.

URI coach Boe Pearman was pleased with her team, which suffered a 59-45 loss to the Minutewomen on Dec. 9 at the Ryan Center.

"We haven't been happy with our rebounding, and I had on the board before the game that rebounding and defense would win the game tonight."

Clearly her troops responded, as they garnered eight more rebounds than UMass and held the Maroon and White to under 60 points – the seventh time that has occurred this season.

Pearman also recognized the difference between the team that played her squad last night and the one that beat her nearly two months ago.

"Katie Nelson made a big difference," Pearman said. "We were able to take their primary shooter out, and do some different things defensively. She is a scorer, and a leader, and someone that everyone else feels confident with."

With the absence of Nelson, the Rams were able to put more pressure on senior Jennifer Butler, who still managed to score 19 points despite getting few clear looks throughout the night.

Nelson, who scored 11 points and added four assists in the previous meeting of the two teams, was absent with a knee injury that will keep her out at least another two weeks.

The Minutewomen were also outrebounded for just the sixth time this season, and were clearly lacking their trademark inside tenacity. They shot just 14-for-25 from within ten feet, and were outscored 37-30 in the paint.

UMass had some chances to even up the game down the stretch, but continued to miss opportunities. Dacko was visibly upset with the effort, as well as some controversial calls made by the officials.

She also highlighted a number of her team's own inadequacies after the game.

"We had some open looks, Kristin Cannon and Cindy Gonzalez had 32 minutes, and just four attempts. That's a problem," Dacko said. "You have to at least shoot when you have the nation's number one rebounder.

"We're just not that good of a team to give up open layups, not rotate defensively, and miss layups."

Rhode Island kept the edge for much of the final stanza, although the Minutewomen stayed in it with some long-range shots from Ebony Pegues, and typical inside dirty work from Butler.

Eventually the Minutewomen were forced to foul, but it was simply too late, as the Rams kept the margin wide enough.

With three minutes to go, the Rams were up 58-53, though they were unable to pull away even after a couple of opportunities at the line.

After being down for much of the first half, the Minutewomen grabbed the lead back when Pegues dished to Nekole Smith inside for a layup three minutes into the second frame.

PLAYER OF THE GAME
Denise King
JUNIOR • GUARD • 5-FOOT-9

Scored a game high 23 points and recorded a team-high six rebounds and six assists in a 66-57 win over the Minutewomen.

Both teams spent the first half shooting uncharacteristically well from the field. UMass, coming into the game at a mediocre .396 clip from the field, shot smartly, and had a .542 percentage for the half. URI, which had been tied for last place in the Atlantic 10 in shooting at .394, was even hotter, and went into the break shooting .583.

Things started slow for both clubs, with offensive miscues on both sides. The Rams struck first and set the pace with a long jumper from King.

The Minutewomen finally got things going after a brief interruption due to a faulty clock. Pegues, Smith, and Butler each scored to send the Maroon and White on a 9-1 run.

URI countered quickly, though, and used a series of UMass turnovers to go off on a 7-0 run, bringing the score to 15-11 with 12 minutes to go in the half.

Rhode Island continued to hold the lead, and the Minutewomen failed to respond, missing a number of layups that could have changed the course of the half.

The primary sign that the Minutewomen were missing Nelson was their lack of control, often giving up the ball while trying to force it inside.

After spending much of the first half mired in sloppy play and missed opportunities, the Minutewomen showed some signs of life late, energized by key blocks by Butler. Cleo Foster sent the Minutewomen into the locker room with a long buzzer-beating jumper that rattled the rim before going in.

"I think the kids started off early on believing everything I was telling them," said Dacko, who is now 23-22 in her first year with a team. "Now certain individuals want to do their own thing, and it puts us under the gun."

Up next for the Minutewomen are the Explorers of La Salle. They'll be bringing a 3-4 Atlantic 10 record (11-7 overall) into the Mullins Center on Sunday.

The Explorers are led by a trio of scorers in Davineia Payne (12.9 ppg), Jill Marano (12.6 ppg), and Kat Foley (12.1 ppg). Ekaterina Markova is also averaging 7.2 rebounds per game, and will be a presence inside to counter UMass's Butler.

Sunday's guests are also coming off of a loss, having been blown out by George Washington last night, 81-51.

UMass also hopes to see the return of another key to the offense. In addition to being without Nelson, Judit Zsedenyi was forced to sit out last night's contest. The junior, who has been an increasingly dangerous threat from the 3-point line as of late, suffered minor injuries when the car she was riding in was rear-ended on Route 9 prior to the game. She is expected to be back in the lineup for Sunday's game.

The Minutewomen, who will still be without the services of their starting point guard, see the last-place Explorers as no small challenge.

"When you play in the A-10, there are no weak teams," Pegues said. "We can't take any mindset but that we have to win, and we have to play. There's no relief playing La Salle, no relaxing."

A-10 East cellar dwellers collide

Fordham heads to Mullins on Family Day

By JIM PIGNATIELLO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It has been said numerous times this season, but Saturday's game against Fordham is the most important game of the year to date.

The Massachusetts men's basketball team (7-12, 1-6 Atlantic 10) is tied for dead last in the A-10 East with the Rams – its opponent at the Mullins Center on Saturday at 2 p.m. The game will mark UMass' return home after a three-game road trip that resulted in a 1-2 record.

"This is going to be a big game for us," Maroon and White coach Steve Lappas said on his radio show on the UMass Radio Network on Thursday night.

The Atlantic 10 Tournament pits East Division teams against West Division teams in the first round. Teams that finish in the top two places in both divisions receive byes in to the second round, which will pick up in Dayton's UD Arena. The first round is held on campus sites.

Since the Minutemen are likely to end up in either fifth or sixth place in the East, they will be matched up with the third or fourth place team in the West in the first round.

Over in the West, there is a huge gap between the top three teams and the rest of the field. That division's top three squads – Dayton, Richmond and Xavier – are all potential NCAA Tournament entries and would be very tough games for the Maroon and White.

Meanwhile, La Salle, George Washington and Duquesne are fighting for that No. 4 spot. UMass is perfectly capable of beating any of these teams.

If the season ended today, the Minutemen would finish last in the East, losing the tiebreaker with Fordham, who they lost to 80-67 in the Bronx, N.Y. on Jan. 5.

UMass would then travel to Xavier for a first-round matchup with NCAA Player of the Year candidate David West and All-American candidate Romain Sato.

Not exactly the easiest route to Dayton.

A loss tomorrow night would essentially guarantee this near-impossible matchup – or a very similar one – in round one.

A win over Fordham would lift the Minutemen up to 2-6 and even the teams' head-to-head tiebreaker. UMass would move up to fifth place and control its own destiny.

It's not like the Rams (2-16, 1-6 A-10), who haven't won since the UMass game, have been playing well at all this year. They've lost six games since that contest and only two have been within double-digits.

But the Rams sure gave the Minutemen fits in their first matchup.

"They've struggled except for the night they played us," Lappas said.

Glenn Batemon, Fordham's 360-pound center, set the tone early in the first matchup, scoring six quick points underneath to start the game and get his team out to an early lead. Batemon also grabbed a game-high 11 rebounds in the contest.

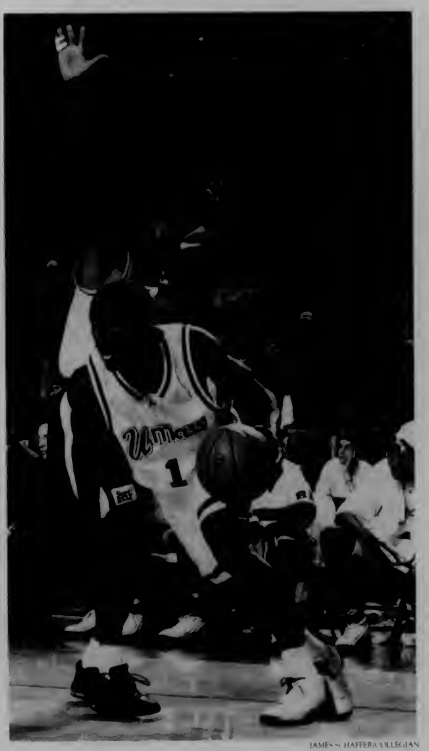
Fordham led by 14 at the half and held UMass off for its second win of the year.

Junior Mark Jarrell-Wright and Michael Haynes led Fordham in that contest, scoring 18 and 15 points respectively. Point guard Anthonique Wilson chipped in with a season-high 14 points.

UMass' Jackie Rogers and Mike Lasme played extremely well in the contest, but the rest of the team was horrendous.

Lasme and Rogers combined for 38 points on 16-for-22 shooting (.727), but the remainder of the Minutemen shot just 12-for-40 (.300) in the contest.

Lasme's 18 points marked a career-high at the time.



Sunday's game is Family Day. Fans can receive four tickets, four hot dogs and four sodas for $50.

Lappas is hoping families will come check out his young players, specifically rookies Jeff Viggiano, Gabe Lee and Lasme, all of whom are starting for the Minutemen.

"I think people are going to see these three and see something they like," said Lappas, who points to them, his first recruiting class, as a sure sign of the program moving in the right direction.

Since inserting the trio into the starting lineup, all three players are averaging double-digits in points.

Lappas, who earned his 250th career win against George Washington on Saturday, reached another, less enjoyable, milestone in Wednesday's 83-55 loss to Dayton. The defeat was the 200th of the former Villanova and Manhattan coach's career.

Tiger's dominating 2002 not as easy as it looked

By DOUG FERGUSON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Tiger Woods is a pretty good actor, too.

In his first interview since knee surgery, Woods revealed that another dominant performance last year wasn't as easy as it might have looked. Pain in his left knee was so intense that he felt sick to his stomach, and even took injections just to keep playing.

"It was a tough, tough year, one I don't want to have to go through again," Woods said Wednesday during a conference call for the Masters.

There was nothing wrong with the results.

Despite a knee injury that got worse as the season went on, Woods became the first player in 30 years to win the first two majors. He wound up with six victories worldwide, and swept all the big awards for the fourth straight year.

How good would he be on two legs?

Woods could get an answer soon. He received clearance from his doctors Saturday to hit a driver and as many practice balls as he wants. He will decide next week whether he is fit enough to return Feb. 13 for the Buick Invitational in San Diego.

If not, Woods said he would try to play either of the following weeks, in the Nissan Open at Riviera or the Match Play Championship.

Woods had knee surgery during the time he played at Stanford, although he says this injury is unrelated. He started feeling intermittent pain about two years ago, but it was never sore long enough for him to pay attention.

"Last year, toward the end, it was brutal," he said. "A lot of times, I didn't want to go out there and play. I felt nausea in my stomach because the pain was so great. I had it injected numerous times to play last year.

"I know what other athletes go through with those needles. It's not fun."

Woods said the pain affected him in some of the majors. It was hard to tell.

He won the Masters and U.S. Open by three strokes each, finished second by one stroke in the PGA Championship and was in contention in the British Open until an 81 on a cold, blustery Saturday at Muirfield.

"You've got to put it aside and play," he said.

The worst he felt was at Sherwood Country Club in December, when he made up seven shots on Padraig Harrington in the final round before losing by two. He told his agent the night before he might have to withdraw.

"In the morning, it was borderline I would play," Woods said. "I took painkillers, and it still hurt. As it started getting warmer, I was feeling better and said, 'Let's give it a try.'"

Space shuttle destroyed

Seven astronauts die as craft burns up upon re-entry

By MARCIA DUNN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

High over Texas and just short of home, space shuttle Columbia fell to pieces Saturday, raining debris over hundreds of miles of countryside. Seven astronauts perished – a gut-wrenching loss for a country and world already staggered by tragedy.

The catastrophe occurred 39 miles above the Earth, in the last 16 minutes of the 16-day mission as the spaceship re-entered the atmosphere and glided in for a landing in Florida. In its horror and in its backdrop of a crystal blue sky, the day echoed one almost exactly 17 years before, when the Challenger exploded.

"The Columbia is lost," said President Bush, after he telephoned the families of the astronauts to console them.

"The same creator who names the stars also knows the names of the seven souls we mourn today," Bush said, his eyes glistening. "The crew of the shuttle Columbia did not return safely to Earth but we can pray they are safely home."

The search for the cause began immediately. One focus: possible damage to Columbia's protective thermal tiles on the left wing from a flying piece of debris during liftoff on Jan. 16.

The loss of seven explorers of space's dark reaches – shuttle commander Rick Husband, Michael Anderson, David Brown, Kalpana Chawla, Laurel Clark, William McCool and Ilan Ramon – brought a new round of grief to a nation still in mourning after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

And again, Americans were forced to confront the risks of space, along with the glories.

"The reality of what these people do has often escaped me," said Charlie Dillon, 52, of Denver. "But they are frontiersman, they're out there making my life better and creating endless possibilities for my children."

NASA appointed an independent commission to investigate. The agency said the first indication of trouble Saturday was the loss of temperature sensors in the left wing's hydraulic system.

The spacecraft had just re-entered the atmosphere and had reached the point at which it was subjected to the highest temperatures.

NASA officials said they suspected the wing was damaged on liftoff, but felt there was no reason for concern. They cautioned that it may have had nothing to do with the accident.

Authorities said there was no indication of terrorism; at 207,135 feet, the shuttle was out of range of any surface-to-air missile, one senior government official said. Security was extraordinarily tight on this mission because Ramon, Israel's first astronaut, was among the crew members.

Television footage showed a bright light followed by white smoke plumes streaking diagonally across the brilliant sky. Debris appeared to break off into separate balls of light as it continued downward.

"We saw it coming across the sky real bright and shiny and all in one piece. We thought it was the sun shining off an airplane," said Doug Ruby, who was driving with his father along a Texas highway, headed for a fishing trip. "Then it broke up in about six pieces – they were all balls of fire – before it went over the tree line."

Pieces of the spacecraft were found in several east Texas counties and in Louisiana. Among the items found: An astronaut's charred patch, and a flight helmet. A piece of debris the size of a compact car fell into Toledo Bend Reservoir on the Texas-Louisiana line, said Sabine County Sheriff Tom Maddox.

There was at least one report of human remains recovered – in Hemphill, Texas, near the Louisiana line, a hospital employee on his way to work reported finding what appeared to be a charred torso, thigh bone and skull on a rural road near what was believed to be other debris.

The FAA issued a notice to airmen because the National Weather Service radar picked up a debris cloud about 95 miles long and 13 to 22 miles wide over Lake Charles, La.

The Army's 1st Cavalry Division sent a helicopter search-and-rescue task force from Fort Hood, Texas. NASA also asked members of the public to help in its search for debris, but warned people not to touch the pieces because they might be contaminated with toxic propellants.

The shuttle flight was the 113th in the shuttle program's 22 years and the 28th flight for Columbia, NASA's oldest shuttle. It was built in 1981 at a cost of about $1 billion.

The horrific end of shuttle mission STS-107 was a devastating blow to the nation's space program; the Challenger explosion led to a 2 1/2-year moratorium on launches, and Saturday's accident could bring construction of the international space station to a standstill.

The shuttle delivers components of the space station to be installed; it also carries crews to and from the station. The three astronauts now on board the station could return to Earth at a moment's notice via a Russian vehicle attached to the space station.

Six shuttle flights had been planned for 2003 – five of them to the space station. The next was scheduled for March 1.

"We trust the prayers of the nation will be with them and with their families. A more courageous group of people you could not have hoped to know," said NASA Administrator Sean O'Keefe.

Columbia's crew had completed 80-plus scientific research experiments during their time in orbit. It was a relatively inexperienced crew; only three – Husband, Anderson and Chawla – had ever flown before.

The others were rookies, including Ramon, the 48-year-old Israeli Air Force colonel. A former fighter pilot who survived two wars, he carried into space a small pencil drawing titled "Moon Landscape" by Peter Ginz, a 14-year-old Jewish boy killed at Auschwitz.

Region, America mourn loss of Columbia crew

By DAN LAMOTHE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Across both the commonwealth and nation, people congregated yesterday to grieve and pray for victims involved in the Columbia space shuttle disaster.

At the University of Massachusetts, fans in attendance observed a moment of silence at both the men's basketball game Saturday and the women's game yesterday.

The congregation at the Newman Center offered masses for the victims yesterday, according to Father Sean McDonagh.

"We prayed that this disaster inspire young men and women to fathom God's creation better," he said.

McDonagh said that he thought one positive of the tragedy was that disasters like this can serve as a wake-up call.

"Young men and women can make a difference as these men and women did," he said.

McDonagh said a memorial service this week was possible, but that nothing was planned yet.

UMass spokesperson Barbara Pitoniak said that she did not know if anything was planned in terms of a memorial service on campus.

The Associated Press reported that Harvard president Lawrence Summers addressed about 60 people at a service in Harvard's Memorial Church last night.

"Occasions like this are occasions when we do more than grieve," he said. "We celebrate the accomplishments of those who were lost ... we celebrate the physical courage of those who risk their lives for what they believe in, for the search of truth."

Harvard students at the service told the AP that it was an appropriate time for reflection.

"This felt like the right place to be," Jeff Bean, 18, a religion student from Montgomery, Ala., said. "I think oftentimes people live their daily lives and don't think they're being heroic. Space travel was the daily life of these people. I'm just here to celebrate heroism of these people and others."

Nels Peterson, 25, a law student from Atlanta, told the AP that he could not let the incident go unremembered.

"Any time something of this nature happens, it's important to take a step back and reflect on more important things in life," he said. "It's important to respect the people who risk their lives for the country and for the future of the country."

Rabbi David Kudan, of Harvard Hillel, felt the loss of the seven astronauts "as a human being, as an American and as a Jew."

"Colonel [Ilan] Ramon represented the best of the Jewish people and the highest ideals of the Israeli nation," Kudan told the AP. "This loss of seven lives was a tragic one for our nation and for the nation of Israel."

The AP reported that members of Temple Israel of Greater Miami recited the Mourner's Kaddish, or traditional prayer for the dead, for Israeli astronaut Ramon and the six other crewmembers. The tragedy happened on the Sabbath, when Jews are prohibited from mourning, so many congregations held special services yesterday.

"It is like something has broken," said Karina Zilberman, who helped lead the Temple Israel service.

"The purpose was for them to come back and share their experiences."

Iraq wants to meet Powell

By EDITH M. LEDERER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS (AP) – Iraq's U.N. ambassador said yesterday he will ask to speak to the Security Council after Secretary of State Colin Powell presents what the United States says will be new evidence of Iraq's weapons programs and links to al-Qaida.

Ambassador Mohammed Al-Douri said the Iraqi government has decided against sending a high-ranking official to respond to Powell. But he said he will make a formal request Monday to the council president, Germany's U.N. Ambassador Gunter Pleuger, to speak after the secretary of state's address Wednesday.

"We will assert our position that we have no link with al-Qaida, whatever Mr. Colin Powell says," Al-Douri said. "We will also assert our position to be fully cooperative with the inspectors, and we will state that the meeting on Feb. 8-9 (with top weapons inspectors Hans Blix and Mohamed ElBaradei) will produce positive results."

There had been speculation in diplomatic circles that Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz might attend.

"It has been decided they will not send anyone, so I will represent the country," Al-Douri told The Associated Press. "I will ask to speak."

The United States requested the meeting so Powell can unveil newly declassified intelligence. The Bush administration hopes the information will convince reluctant council members that U.N. inspections are not working because of continued Iraqi defiance – finding that could pave the way for military action.

The United States faces an uphill struggle to get council support for a quick war against Iraq. Despite critical reports from top U.N. inspectors and President Bush laying out his case against Saddam Hussein during his State of the Union address, 11 of the 15 council members said last week they favored continued inspections and efforts to disarm Iraq peacefully.
